However, the importance of San Jacinto is not in the number killed or the number engaged. Its political importance far outweighed all such considerations. Texas was now free, her independence recognized by the enemy, and she could begin her career as a nation. The life of the Republic that began in so much violence and disorder continued until 1845 when, of her own free will, under no compulsion whatever, by formal treaty she became a part of the great Republic of the United States. Texas was not annexed, but came like a bride, after proper wooing, in honorable marriage and protected by a prenuptial contract made between sovereignties. It is the only State of the Union that ever exercised the full rights of sovereignty in dealing with other Governments. The Republic had her diplomatic representatives in Europe and in the United States, and maintained a small but valiant army and something of a navy.

By the terms of her admission to the Federal Union Texas retained all her public lands. It was also stipulated in the treaty that the new State might cut her territory into five States, and that these should be admitted into the Union, a privilege that few people have ever thought of asserting. Each of the States so admitted, whether one or five, was to be permitted to come in with or without slavery.

I want to assure my friends from Massachusetts that that is another treaty right we will not assert.

As a Republic, Texas had a peaceful history. It is probably the only sovereignty that never in its entire life engaged in a foreign war. Texas had ministers in France and England, and both were represented in the Republic, but her people were not skilled in the arts of diplomacy and knew nothing of its forms and conventions. There was a near war with France when a simple Republican tavern keeper threatened to chastise, or, as some have it, did chastise the French minister for shooting his pigs that had wandered into the legation. Fortunately there were no cables in those days to carry such news to the Government concerned, and before France heard of the trouble the entente cordiale had been reestablished.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS.

Life in Texas, when these great things were being done was not all cakes and ale, nor, on the other hand, an unending round of fighting and hardships. I have in my possession at this time the diary of an unusually intelligent, educated, and refined woman that covers the period from 1836 down to the war between the States. Her stories of fierce Indian fights, some of which she saw, are as thrilling as any romance of the frontier ever published. The primitive life of the Republic and of those days is illustrated in stories, each of which is an instructive essay. The complete independence of character and utter unfitness of such people for menial service is shown in her account of a visit made to her by President Lamar and his staff. There was a great dinner to which the fine people came to pay their respects to the President of the Republic. But there was a servant problem then, as now, and our hostess had to pick up such help as she could find. A white man absolutely without experience was engaged and as thoroughly drilled as possible. After he had made one or two trips to and from the kitchen he appeared without a coat. The mistress called him to her side and whispered a command to put on his coat. His perfectly audible reply was, "I would, ma'am, but it is too damned hot."

When Texas did these great things, Mr. Chairman, when she declared her independence of Mexico and made the declaration good, there were in all that vast territory only 30,000 Anglo-Americans. Indians, Mexicans, and negroes were estimated at 22,500. The enemy challenged by the 30,000 whites numbered about 7,000,000, making odds of 233 to 1 against the Texans; but in a few months after hostilities began a new nation was born and constitutional, republican liberty was strengthened by the support of another great moral and physical force. That power never died. When it ceased to exist independently it voluntarily merged with the American Republic; the Lone Star of Texas became one of a constellation.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a very brief outline of the history of Texas to 1845. Heaven grant that the spirit of liberty and order that directed its founders when, in the midst of enemies, they set up government in the wilderness may never die, but remain forever a bulwark of defense for order and law. It seems to be needed now more than ever to avoid the dangers of radicalism sweeping over the world and the more insidious but equal peril of centralization now threatening in our own country. We must grapple with and destroy the monster of anarchy, but in doing so we should not forget for a moment that no government and too much government are both dangerous to the liberty of the people. Anarchy threatens the state and the family on which it is based; centralization in our country will destroy the federated, constitutional Union. Whether born in the disordered minds of Mujiks, who have endured centuries of oppression, or presented in the guise of an economic proposal, anarchy, as well as socialism, is an enemy of liberty and must be destroyed. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 15 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, what I wish to say is in regard to the demobilization of our military and naval forces, mostly in regard to our military forces.

On November 21, just 10 days after the signing of the armistice, the War Department issued Circular No. 77, which I shall insert in the RECORD, with the leave of the House, and shall quote only a single paragraph from it:

Circular No. 77.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 21, 1918.

DISCHARGE OF ENLISTED MEN FOR RELIEF OF FAMILY OR URGENT NEED IN INDUSTRIAL WORK.

1. Department commanders within the United States, commanders of ports of embarkation, and commanders of camps not under the jurisdiction of department commanders or of chiefs of bureaus of the War Department, are authorized to discharge enlisted men upon their own application when there is sickness or other distress in the soldier's family, or when he is needed to resume employment in an industry or occupation in which there is urgent need of his services, provided that such discharge will not disrupt or cripple an existing organization, and that the soldier's services can be spared. Consideration will be given to the fact that the machinery of camps must be utilized in the demobilization of the Army and due regard must be taken that it is not retarded by the discharge of personnel connected therewith.

2. The instructions contained herein apply only to individual and exceptional cases and are not intended to release men in large groups or blocks for any general employment or occupation.

3. Application for discharge under the provisions of this circular will be made in each individual case by the soldier concerned and through his immediate commanding officer. No man who voluntarily enlisted prior to April 1, 1917, will be discharged under this authority.

4. Men discharged under these instructions will be included in such weekly reports of men discharged as are required by the War Department.

5. Cases of the character indicated arising in places not covered by this authority will be forwarded to The Adjutant General of the Army for final action.

[220.81, A. G. O.]

By order of the Secretary of War:

PEYTON C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Official:

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

As you will observe, this is somewhat cryptic in its phraseology. At least it allowed opportunities for diverse action, as it was construed by different officers of the Army. Perhaps with a view of clarifying the meaning of Circular 77, or of trying to make action under it more nearly uniform, on January 6 of this year Circular No. 6 was issued. I shall read only a part of it and insert it all in the RECORD, if the House will permit:

Circular No. 6.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 6, 1919.

DELAY IN DISCHARGE OF ENLISTED MEN FOR URGENT REASONS.

1. Applications for immediate discharge under the provisions of Circular No. 77, War Department, 1918, will be acted upon as expeditiously as possible, and the applicants will be informed without unnecessary delay of the action taken. Deserving cases should be investigated, and where the applicants have not correctly or fully stated their reasons for asking immediate discharge, officers should render such assistance as may be necessary to correct them so that the applications may be properly presented and acted upon.

2. Circular No. 77, War Department, 1918, was issued to relieve domestic distress and to release men whose individual services are shown to be urgently needed and indispensable to an industry or occupation. In passing on applications under the latter head, the test to be applied is not the existence of a general shortage of labor in any trade or business, but the value to a given employer or business of the particular individual concerned, and the impracticability of securing a substitute. It will be found that nearly all cases properly coming under this head are cases of resumption of a former position in which an individual has been specially trained.

3. All applications for discharge under the provisions of Circular No. 77 will receive careful and conscientious consideration and prompt action.

(220.81, A. G. O.)

By order of the Secretary of War:

PEYTON C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Official:

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

Mr. CALDWELL. What is the number of that circular?

Mr. TILSON. It is Circular No. 6, series of 1919. The series for 1918 ended on the 31st of December and a new series began on January 1. This is Circular No. 6 for 1919.

Mr. Chairman, my contention is that these circulars, which amount to orders from the War Department, have not been fairly acted upon by junior, intermediate, and, in some cases, higher commanders.

I can not be accused of being an unfriendly critic of the Army. In fact, I have been regarded during by service in this House as a friend of the Army. I am a friend of the Army, which is sufficient cause for my saying some of the things I shall say to-day. If such conduct as I shall mention continues, it is inevitable that our Army itself will come into ill repute on account of it and the innocent will have to suffer with the guilty.

Army officers should act in good faith under these circulars and not in accord with their own convenience. From numerous cases, papers concerning which are in my possession, it appears that applications made by soldiers, accompanied by the facts clearly stated, showing dependence or showing the needs of their business, have not been accepted by the lieutenant or captain commanding the organization. Perhaps every Member here has received letters of this kind from their soldier boys in which it is stated the captain would not even accept their application. Even where the application has been accepted by the lower unit commander, somehow or other, before it gets through the office of the commanding officer and all the way up to the department commander it has been decided by some one along the line that the young man can not be spared. I have investigated a number of these cases and, as a rule, find the facts to be that a great number of soldiers are in that camp or organization doing nothing—absolutely nothing.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. TILSON. For a question only.

Mr. RUCKER. In connection with what you have just said, I have had at least two letters from soldiers in camp in which they said the lower officer or lieutenant would not accept their application for discharge because the commanding officer of the camp had told them not to do so. I do not know whether it is true or not.

Mr. TILSON. I think that probably such letters could be duplicated by almost every Member on the floor of this House, indicating that what my friend from Missouri says is true in a great many cases.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TILSON. Briefly.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Do not the regulations require that when an application is filed it must go to the superior officer to be approved by him?

Mr. TILSON. It is the usual military procedure that when an application is properly filed it shall go through regular channels and be either approved or disapproved. I protest against the fact that they are not received in many cases. I protest generally against the attitude of Army officers as shown by their conduct in these cases. Such officers seem to regard it as more important that they should keep men in their companies, for something or for nothing, than that these men when not needed or when they can be spared should be permitted to return to their families and their business. In time of actual war everything must give way to military necessity. Family relationships and the business by which men earn their bread must suffer or be sacrificed if need be. I protest against the attempt of those clothed with a little brief authority to make such abnormal conditions permanent. When the dire necessity of war has passed men's families and their business by which they support their families resume their place of prime importance.

I wish to say that I speak only of demobilization in this country, because those across the water are on a different basis, and I shall not speak of them in this connection. I am speaking of this country, where the boast is being made as to how rapidly we are demobilizing. Thousands of men are being discharged who would gladly remain in the service longer, while other thousands are being held against their will to their great loss.

I have one instance here before me where it appears that it is well known that there will be hundreds of men discharged from a particular unit within the next few days. One man established a perfectly good case to the effect that he is the superintendent of a large business and that he is very much needed in order that that business may go on. He is only a private soldier, and yet the officer has returned the papers disapproved on the ground that the soldier can not be spared. Discharging hundreds every day, and yet certify that one private soldier can not be spared. Meanwhile the evidence of the private soldier himself, with a number of others corroborating it, is to the effect that they are doing absolutely nothing. Yet the officer says he can not spare one man.

Mr. ROSE. Will all these complaints that we are making, without some resolution or bill upon the part of Congress, get us anywhere?

Mr. TILSON. What I am saying to-day is in order to call the attention of the country, and certainly the attention of the War Department, to the fact that even the instructions that have been sent out by that department, apparently in good faith, and which would cover most of the hard cases of dependents and business reasons, are not being acted upon in good faith. It is bringing reproach upon the War Department itself. It is discreditable to the Army.

Many of these cases of refusal are for discreditable reasons. In some cases it is because the applicants are good men and it might prove to be a slight inconvenience for the officer in command if he permitted his good men to go. He may be willing to discharge others, but if he has a particularly good man he does not wish to let him go. The reason is clerical work in some instances. A $10,000 a year enlisted man is held indefinitely to be a clerk for a $2,000 a year lieutenant. In other instances it is because the men are good chauffeurs. There are many of these cases. Two men came up the other day from a camp near Washington, one from my own State and the other from the State of Minnesota. They belong to the Motor Transport Corps. They said there were 70 men in their organization. They said that there never was a day in which more than 10 of the 70 men were engaged in doing anything. The only work of some of them was to drive officers to the bank or elsewhere about the city or country in automobiles. Still their applications for discharge had been refused.

In the Navy similar orders have been issued, but have been acted upon in a much more intelligent and satisfactory manner. The Navy is in a different position, too, because the Navy is not so largely demobilizing. It is trying to keep a large number of good men and would be justified in much more rigid requirements than can be justified in the Army. The Marine Corps is still better. The Marine Corps is very desirous of holding its men, especially its good men, and yet I have had hardly a case of complaint from the Marine Corps, because Marine officers are considering each individual case on its merits, and because they do not desire to keep even good men in cases where they ought to be permitted to return to their families or their business.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to know whether the gentleman has any information to the effect that where Members of Congress write commanding officers they immediately turn down and refuse the request because it comes from a Member of Congress?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know that I can blame an Army officer so very much for that, because that is not good business. It ought not to be so that an Army officer will discharge a man simply because a Member of Congress writes him to do so. We should not ask for anything of that kind. Where a good case has been made, where a man, on his own application, accompanied by the proper statement, has shown that family or business reasons bring him within the rule laid down by the War Department itself, then the rule should be acted upon in good faith and the man discharged from the service.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman does not mean to say that a Member of Congress has not the right to ask a commanding officer to consider the facts?

Mr. TILSON. Such a request is perfectly proper, but it ought not to be necessary for a Member of Congress to ask an Army officer to consider the facts. He ought to do it as a matter of right upon the application of the soldier without the necessity for any request on the part of a Member of Congress.

Mr. RUCKER. What are we going to do if he will not do it?

Mr. TILSON. I think something ought to be done. The War Department itself should do something. After the attention of the War Department has been called to these facts, if nothing happens there, then something ought to be done here.

Mr. RUCKER. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not think I ever saw a better place in the world where the gentleman's remarks would fit in than in a case where I gave one commanding officer the devil and got results by so doing.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman did well, but such extreme measures ought not to be necessary. Such conduct on the part of Members of Congress generally might not be considered a proper course, and surely it ought not to be necessary to follow it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, if this sort of thing goes on, the Army is going to be made the most unpopular institution in the whole country and Army service is going to be made the least desirable of our services. It ought not to be so. We are demobilizing millions of men, and they are being discharged every day. It is not necessary for us to keep all of these men in the service, and it is so stated by the War Department. Then, it seems to me, we ought to discharge those men who present good cases under the rules laid down by the War Department itself—good cases of family dependence or of business needs.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think these orders of the War Department are in good faith?

Mr. TILSON. I do not say that they are not in good faith. They are apparently in good faith. Under them some Army officers are acting intelligently and wisely and discharging the men who ought to be discharged.

Mr. MANN. Well, if these orders are issued in good faith and are not being carried out by subordinate officers, do not a lot of these officers need to be court-martialed for refusing to accept papers that they are bound to accept, but who are paying no attention whatever to the regulations and terms of discharge?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. I think a lot of officers ought to be reprimanded or court-martialed for not acting properly under these orders.

Mr. MANN. I think it emanates from the head of the War Department here and the Chief of Staff.

Mr. TILSON. Wherever it originates, it ought to be done away with, and if the head of the department is responsible for it he ought to be severely criticized until he stops it.

Mr. MANN. The delightful head of the department, not knowing what is going on in the department, takes the word of some officer, and everything is "lovely" with him.

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. PAIGE. I want to cite a case in my own town, where a man had three sons in the Army. One has died in France, another has died here, and he himself has died, and the man's wife is totally dependent on the other young man left in France. Ought he not to be discharged?

Mr. TILSON. On a proper statement of those facts to the commanding officer he should be discharged, without doubt.

Can I have a couple of minutes more?

Mr. STAFFORD. How much time did I yield to the gentleman?

Mr. TILSON. Ten minutes; and I have two minutes left.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman state why the veterinarians are retained in the service? My understanding is that the Army is disposing of the horses, and these veterinarians are not needed. I understand there is not a horse within 600 miles of where the veterinarians are stationed, and still they are kept in the service.

Mr. TILSON. That is probably true. The great cry that I hear, coming up from the men in all of these camps is, "We are doing nothing; we are eating Uncle Sam's chow and receiving his pay, and we are doing nothing."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. In connection with the colloquy between the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I want to say that if the gentleman from Connecticut brings his great intellect and usefulness to bear upon the problem, I hope he will not fail to put into his legislation something that will demobilize some of these titled officers. I think there is where the trouble lies.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is right, as usual. I believe the trouble lies with some of these titled officers. I believe that the reason why many enlisted men are kept in the service is that some of these Army officers, who are holding better jobs now than they ever held before in their lives, wish to keep a large number of enlisted men in the service in order to make their jobs more important and more permanent. That is the nub of the whole matter, in my judgment. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. I think the gentleman hit the bull's-eye that time.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman know who is at the head of the demobilization service in the Army?

Mr. TILSON. There are several heads. Beginning up at the very top, there is the President, who is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, then the Secretary of War, the department commanders, and so on down to the little fellows.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman knows, if he knows anything about it at all, that Col. E. D. Anderson is in charge of it.

Mr. TILSON. That fact is of no importance in this connection. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to take advantage of my position in the House to say anything about men who can not appear on this floor and answer me, and for that reason I am not using any names this morning. If it shall become necessary, I have a considerable list of names here where, in my judgment, Army officers have not acted in good faith, and I shall make it my business to present these names here and have them printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, along with the facts in the several cases, and show that they have not acted in good faith. I do not wish to do this if the proper result can be brought about in any other way. As I have suggested, I do not think it right, on general principles, to attack men here where they can not talk back. For that reason I shall not be specific as to names in my remarks to-day. However, I have the facts and names here before me, to be used if necessary, and I have no doubt that other gentlemen in this House can duplicate these facts. Something ought to be done, and if the War Department itself does not voluntarily do it, then our assistance should be given here in the form of legislation or the withholding of appropriations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE] three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I take it that every Member of this House is able to reproduce all of the cases that were submitted by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I have tried under the rules issued by the department to give instructions concerning discharges, and I received a letter yesterday from a lady well known in the city of Johnstown, Pa., and now located at Newport News, Va., with her husband, commenting upon the application of the latter. The application for his discharge was made in accordance with the orders promulgated by the War Department, and accompanied by affidavit from the employer of the soldier and by letter from the State employment bureau giving the reasons upon which the application for discharge was based. I understand that the order was approved by the captain, by the company commander of the soldier, and the major, and subsequently recalled by the major. From the letter mentioned, bearing date January 12, 1919, I quote the following:

> I called the major yesterday to ask him about the papers, and, Mr. ROSE, he acted anything but a gentleman to me, saying that he thinks I should be satisfied that my husband was allowed to stay with me at night; also that I have been able to work.

The reply of that official is brutal, if not suggestive. This is only one of many cases that have come to my notice, but I desire to call your attention to another case which strongly appeals to me. It is that of a well-known physician residing in Johnstown, Pa., who has been assigned for duty in one of the hospitals in the State of New York, and in his letter, among other things, says:

> We have no patients in this hospital at all, and it certainly is distressing to sit around all day long with nothing to do. Some of the doctors have been here for three months and have not done a tap in all this time.

And yet he is unable to obtain his discharge from the service. For reasons well understood, I do not give his name, and I have declined to make a personal request for his discharge for the reason that any attempt upon the part of Members of Congress to assist in that direction have been frowned upon. Something must be done. There should be an investigation. Without definite action I think that all the complaints that we are making can get us nowhere at all, and, of course, the Army will get into disrepute unless we can do something to satisfy the people that the discipline in the Army of the United States is what it ought to be.

I am reminded this morning by a communication from a very distinguished gentleman in the congressional district I have the honor to represent that the Members of this Congress are not doing right by the people; that they are sitting idly by while our young men are compelled to remain in the Army, where they are not needed, and prevented from taking up employment in places where their services would be of inestimable value at this time.

When we do make efforts to strictly follow the orders given by the department, but which contain a reservation holding the balance of power, we get nowhere. I am tired of having these complaints coming by the score, but with all the agitation and all the just criticism which has been made against the War Department, we are no nearer the solution of the problem than when we started. Of course, I am not in position to say who is to blame, but I agree with the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] that something must be done and done quickly in the interest of our soldier boys. There must be some authority somewhere, and I trust that an investigation will soon follow, resulting in discharges and demobilization in accordance with the orders that have been issued and which we have tried so diligently to follow.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY].

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have been directed by the Committee on Pensions to inform the House that the committee to-day, by unanimous vote, approved the bill (H. R. 13879) granting to Mrs. Edith Carow Roosevelt, as widow of the late Col. Roosevelt, a pension of $5,000 a year, and instructed the chairman of the committee to prepare a report and file it at the earliest possible date. Just as soon as this report is in, which will be in a day or two, it is my intention to ask the House to take favorable action on the bill.

Mr. DYER. I ask for half a minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri half a minute.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman from Ohio probably knows that the Senate passed this same bill yesterday. Why not call it up and pass it here?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The House bill was introduced first.

Mr. DYER. Well, I know; but the Senate passed a similar bill yesterday.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The House bill was introduced some days prior to that in the Senate and has been duly considered by a House committee, as it should be, and reported. I think the House bill, of course, should be considered by the House after the House has referred it to one of its own committees and that committee has faithfully and promptly considered and reported the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, lest we forget how many people are involved in the difficulties that attend the demobilization of the Army, it is well to remember that approximately 2,000,000 men are yet in France and that approximately 1,500,000 men are in the cantonments in this country.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. How many have been discharged?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I can not say. I understand that we have had approximately 2,200,000 men overseas and that approximately 300,000 have been returned from overseas.

Mr. GORDON. There have been over 1,100,000 discharged. Our Army must have been a good deal bigger than I supposed it was if the gentleman's figures are approximately correct.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. So far as the number overseas is concerned, I have my information from a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. I am absolutely at a loss to know how many have been discharged in this country. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. GORDON. The last statement I saw was that something over 1,100,000 had been discharged.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. In this country?

Mr. GORDON. No; altogether.

Mr. MADDEN. The statement was that 1,150,000 had been ordered discharged, of whom 693,000 had been discharged.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. At least, there is such a large body of men involved that it certainly is worth our while to make note of the magnitude of this question. In addition to that, there are also 100,000,000 people in this country who are so interested that when these agencies of the Government are indicted the indictment is not by the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Massachusetts. The indictment is from the cantonments; the indictment is from the hospitals; the indictment is from the homes of these boys. It is said that the War Risk Insurance Bureau is working inadequately. It is said that the mail to the boys in the hospitals is not delivered. It has been said without contradiction on the floor of the House that 8 or 10 carloads of mail sent to France have been returned. It has been charged that the condition of camps and hospitals in France is not only unsatisfactory, but that there has been almost criminal negligence in the care of them. That indictment comes up out of the hearts of the great people of this country, who were solidified behind this Government and gave freely of their substance, and gladly, though with heartstrings breaking, gave of their flesh and blood. Yet all we can do here is to voice their protest. It is a grave charge against the conduct of these various agencies. On the question of demobilization you, as well as myself, have had much experience. I find that men who have positions waiting for them, men who are anxious to get out, and who have made application, find that some petty captain declares that the services of the man are indispensable. Then they come to the Congressman and the Congressman writes the captain, and then they telegraph to him again that the application has been denied. Then the Congressman goes up to see the adjutant general, and goes around and around in a circle until finally, now and then, a man is discharged.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I yield.

Mr. BAER. Does the gentleman know—I have heard it stated by several Members—that the department has removed the provision allowing the boys to make application in order that they may go back into educational institutions, and that it will not allow the boys to get out of the Army for that purpose any more. Does the gentleman understand anything about that?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. All I know is that I had a young man in my office this morning who has had two years of college work and who is a private. I said to him, "Do you want to stay in or get out?" He said, "I would like to finish my college course." I said, "What opportunity have you for getting out?" And he said, "It looks as if there were no opportunity at all."

Mr. CALDWELL. What was the line of work the young man was doing?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. He is connected with a medical unit. I asked if he was very busy, and he said, "Oh, I am punching a typewriter most of the time, though I am from the farm and never had any experience with a typewriter until now. A competent typist could do eight times as much as I can do in half the time."

Mr. CALDWELL. Who is going to do the punching of the typewriter if you turn him loose?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The gentleman has asked a legitimate question. There are men who do not want to get out; there are men who are willing and anxious to remain in the Army. Why not say to the boys, "You who desire to remain and continue as soldiers indicate it, and then let us discriminate in respect to these discharges."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I suggest to the gentleman in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], who is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, that I introduced a resolution authorizing this department to employ civilians to do this clerical work and all work not of a military nature. That resolution is before his committee at this time. We can release thousands of boys all over the United States if the Committee on Military Affairs would only report that resolution.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I understand that one of the executive departments of the Government to-day has many men detailed to it for doing clerical work, and they are being retained in the Army, yet detailed to another department in work not in immediate connection with the Army. I am inclined to think that, so far as demobilization upon the other side is concerned, it would be wise to authorize the organization of an army of 500,000 men who would volunteer out of the men who are over there to do the work that yet remains essential on the other side. No man is so foolish as to think for a moment that we should immediately, with the armistice still pending, withdraw all of our troops from Europe. It would be an act of bad faith on the part of the Government, and yet is it not true that a reorganization permitting the men to enlist who desire to extend their time in Europe would be a wise thing for this Government to enact? [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. FAIRFIELD was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I agree with everything that has been said on this floor about the difficulties we are laboring under in getting our soldiers discharged from military service. I wish to direct the attention of the committee in the time allotted to me to another matter that has been brought very forcibly to my notice by occurrences in my home city, Greensburg, Pa. The great Lincoln Highway extends through that city and extends across the State of Pennsylvania. It has been rebuilt by the State at a very great cost, and over that road the United States Government, since the fall of 1917, has been transporting the automobile trucks for the use of the Army from the factories in the West to point of shipment at Baltimore. I was home on Sunday, December 29. That was a very cold day in that locality. The basement of the First Presbyterian Church of that town has been turned over to the ladies of the city, who have organized a society for the voluntary and charitable subsistence of these troops who are operating these truck trains. They did this all last winter during the severest weather we have ever experienced in that climate. They sent out from this church kitchen, at all hours, day or night, very frequently several miles to where these boys were stuck in the snow, sandwiches and coffee, and at times men to shovel snow to help to bring them in. They have also refitted the State armory there, at considerable expense, by private subscription, in which these men are and have been at night comfortably housed. I thought that this had ceased with the signing of the armistice, but my attention has been called to the fact that this situation continues, and I want to have read from one of the leading daily newspapers of my district, the Greensburg Daily Tribune, an excellent and forceful editorial, printed on the 10th of this month, giving a description of the conditions that exist among the men driving these trucks, to which I wish to direct the careful attention of this committee, and I ask that in my time the Clerk read that editorial, and then I shall make some further comments about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

[From the Greensburg Daily Tribune, Jan. 10, 1919.]

SUSPEND BRUTALITIES.

The truck-train soldiers passing through Greensburg these rough days must agree that Sherman was eminently correct in his estimate of war. These truck-train boys have been exposed to cruel suffering. They deserve better, and they should get better than they are getting.

It is a privilege and a pleasure for the good women of Greensburg to entertain, feed, and generally make comfortable the young soldiers now being compelled to face the winter blasts just to pilot truck trains to the seaboard when they are not needed. To them it is no longer a question of loyalty or devotion to their Government. Last winter the boys who came to this town half frozen and underfed were inspired with the confidence that sometime, sooner or later, they would go abroad and get a taste of the war for which they longed. Now there is no promise or hope of that sort. The men are simply moving trains of the trucks to the East, where they are not needed, and they are forced to the painful exposure without sufficient clothing to keep them comfortable, and without arrangements for their substantial food other than that provided by the generous communities through which they pass. They have no money and many of them go unshaven on that account.

Many of the young soldiers who spent Wednesday night in Greensburg had not been paid for months. Many of them complained that they needed warmer clothing. They confessed the need of clean underclothes, and most of them admitted that their suffering would have been intense had it not been for the Red Cross and the kindly communities through which they pass.

That condition is offensive. It should not be allowed. The Government with billions to waste should be forced to provide better for its soldiers who are probably serving favorite contractors better than they are serving their Government.

The soldiers are always welcome in Greensburg. They are always generously treated when here, but the soldiers should be paid what the Government owes them, and they should be privileged to rest during violent weather. The war is over and its brutalities should be suspended.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, two statements in that editorial I wish to bring to the attention of the Members of this House. The first is that these soldiers are not paid. Why is it? Here are soldiers who are never outside of the limits of counties or cities in which there are located banks, and who have not been outside of the country. If they had checks, they could get money at any time while passing through the country. Yet they have not been paid for months. When I came out of the church on this Sunday in December when I was home I saw 40 Army trucks lined up on either side of the street in front of the church. I went down to the basement to see the boys in the dining room, where dinner was being served to them, and I found many of them without overcoats, complaining of the cold and of the hardships to which they were subjected. I know from personal experience that these men when they are taken to the drug stores for medicine must ask to have the bills paid by the man or the woman who accompanies them, because they have no money. This is not right. There is no reason why these men should not be promptly paid and not made mendicants and beggars.

I desire to bring to your attention another matter alluded to in this editorial, and that is the continued purchase of automobile trucks for the use of our Army. I am told there are now over 100,000 automobile trucks in France, and if anyone makes the trip by rail from Washington to the city of Baltimore he will see acres of Army autotrucks standing over near that city in mass, not being used, the canvas tops rent by the winter winds and the machines rusting and going into decay. Yet the War Department is still going on buying automobile trucks 60 days after the cessation of hostilities. What is the use of this? I appeal to the Members of this House that something ought to be done to stop this waste of the public money. I understand that under the Constitution Congress controls the purse and the sword—at least the Supreme Court has so decided. We have sheathed the sword, and now why do we not take control of the purse? Under the Constitution, as I understand its terms, the unimpaired power of investigation rests in this branch of Congress. Why will Congress not investigate and find out where the money is coming from that is being wasted in buying these useless automobile trucks?

I have introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary of War to report to Congress the number of automobile trucks that our Army has, the purpose for which they are being used, the number being purchased, and what it is proposed to do with them, and where the department is going to get the money to pay for them, because I do not believe in getting up on the floor of Congress and pointing to a wrongful act which amounts to almost a crime, as in this instance, and not suggesting some remedy. We have made no appropriation specifically for this purpose.

Last week when we passed the bill to legalize contracts and permit settlement under contracts, it was reiterated over and over again during the debate that the only reason that bill was being passed was to permit settlements under contracts that had not been formally reduced to writing and properly executed. Are not these automobile contracts in writing? If they are, every one of them contains a clause permitting the Secretary of War to cancel the contract whenever he wishes to do so; and the act we passed last week was to permit an adjustment and settlement promptly out of court of any damages arising from such canceled or unfilled contracts. Yet, notwithstanding full legal authority is vested in the Secretary of War to cancel any and all contracts for the purchase of automobile trucks, still the procession of trucks continues to flow from Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, and the West over the Lincoln Highway, not destined for Europe but to Baltimore, where these Army trucks, standing side by side, cover acres of ground, standing out in the open winter weather and going into rapid deterioration and decay. This item, in the aggregate, amounts to millions and millions of dollars. It is the duty of this Congress to stop it, and I hope the majority party will allow my resolution to come out of the committee and be adopted, so that Congress can put a stop to this reckless waste.

Why does not the Secretary of War cancel these contracts and stop this waste? These automobile trucks that I saw there, 40 of them in the first train and 10 later on that Sunday afternoon, cost the Treasury of the United States not less than four or five thousand dollars each. Where is the money coming from? Is the Government going to sell them to recoup the Treasury? Down in Georgia the other day, you gentlemen will remember, the Quartermaster Department had a sale of horses and mules that the Government had bought at a cost of from $200 to $250 apiece and sold them at from $40 to $75 each, the report further says, and the department has 8 or 10 sales advertised of a like character. What will the Government make out of the sale of automobiles if it is losing on the sale of horses and mules the great sums of money such as indicated by the report of these sales? Oh, gentlemen, I think it is high time—high time, indeed—that this Congress should assert its right and demand to know how the money in the Treasury of the United States is being expended now that the war is over. We have come to a time in this war that no man ought to be accused of the crime of disloyalty or unfairness to the administration if he questions such expenditures. I voted for every dollar that was asked by the administration during the continuance of the war, but now I, for one at least, asserting my privilege as a Member of this House, want to know why this money is being uselessly expended in buying automobile trucks 60 days after the war is over. I speak of this because it is an item to which my attention was directed while these trains of Army trucks were passing through my home city and about which I know something from personal observation.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Briefly.

Mr. WINGO. Can the gentleman give the names of concerns with whom the Government has made contracts to buy automobile trucks since the signing of the armistice?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know the name of any contractor with whom contracts have been made since the date of the armistice. These trucks, I was told by one of the men running them, were made in Detroit. I did not look at the name on the trucks to see whose make they were and I do not know these facts, and I have introduced a resolution to go into an investigation of this whole matter, and hope the gentleman from Arkansas will stand with me and support it.

Mr. WINGO. I should be glad to have such information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am going to ask permission to refer to a matter in the bill perhaps not up for discussion just at this time. Some time ago Congress passed a law creating the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. [Laughter on the Republican side.] When that law was passed it was my understanding—and I should have known more about it, but I did not give the matter sufficient study—that that bureau was to only have control over the insurance taken out in the interest of the soldiers during this war. I did not understand that it was to have control of the pensions of soldiers in this war.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. And when this bill was reported my attention was then called to this feature of the bill. The time must come when this Congress must change existing conditions and existing law in this respect. We are throwing away a very large sum of the people's money.

I notice and you will notice on page 98 of this bill that there is an appropriation for the Pension Bureau, where there are more than 635,000 pension claims to be cared for, of $1,246,540. In addition to that sum there is $100,000 for field service and $6,000 for other matters, making a total of about $1,352,000. In the very near future these allowances to dependents of soldiers in the war will pass out, and allotments to these people will be in the past, and the insurance carried by the Government on the soldier will be transferred to some insurance company undoubtedly, or discontinued, but if you will go to page 42 of this bill you will find a sum of $10,989,000 appropriated in a lump sum for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. No limit as to number of employees; no limit as to salaries, and so forth. Why, that department is scattered over this town in 15 different buildings, and, so help me, it will take a week to get five minutes of information in any of them. [Laughter.] I wrote on the 9th of December to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, asking whether or not a certain soldier who had lost his life had taken out an insurance policy or made application for insurance. That afternoon I received two more just such inquiries, and I took the three letters, and after going to the third building I found that those boys had made application; the one I had written about had made application in August, 1917, for a $10,000 policy. I examined the papers myself; they were furnished to me by a clerk. Three weeks later I received an answer to my letter written that morning of the 9th saying there was no application made by the soldier on file anywhere to be found. He had named as beneficiaries his father and mother, one-half to each. Now, there is $10,989,000 appropriated here for the maintenance of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and it is three, four, or five times as much money as would be necessary to do that same work if that bureau is merged into the Pension Bureau. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I will be glad to do so.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman think there is room in that old Pension Office to house those 14,000——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They ought not to have any 14,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman think the proposition of their being scattered in 15 buildings will be cured by putting them in the old Pension Office——

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me give you some information, my good friend, and this information comes from the Pension Bureau, that if we were to give the Commissioner of Pensions 500 extra clerks he will do the business for which you are asking now an appropriation for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance of $11,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is what the Pension Bureau will do.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield further? Surely the gentleman does not think that the compensation end of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is comparable with the Allotment and Allowance Division——

Mr. FORDNEY. What I do say, my friend—I have only five minutes, and I will have to conclude in that time—is this: This insurance that the Government is now carrying for the soldiers is going to be discontinued in a short time, or transferred to some of the old-line insurance companies.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, now——

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman does not want to make that statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. The chances are it is going to be discontinued. So far as to the soldier that returns from the war uninjured and in good health, a man that requires no Government aid, there is no reason for the Government insuring the soldier after the war is over, the soldier that comes out sound, and he may not continue his insurance with his Government—it is optional with the soldier. He quite likely will transfer his policy to some old-line insurance company. The allotment to his family, his wife, or his mother, or his father will be discontinued the minute he is discharged from the service, and all that will be left for the Government to do will be to pay this compensation, which is a pension in every sense of the word, although we may have given it another name.

Mr. MADDEN. And more than that, you have all these clerks to pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman believe that the 95 per cent of our enlisted force who have taken out insurance will surrender that insurance and take insurance in private insurance companies when the Government is giving them rates which do not charge up the cost of administration and which are less than those charged by private insurance companies?

Mr. FORDNEY. I saw a tabulated statement given to a discharged soldier the other day which showed the amount of premium he must pay monthly upon his policy for a term of years. The rates went on up and up and up, and if the soldier lives to be an old man the rates will go so high that he can not afford to pay it. I think he could get old-line insurance cheaper, and he will not pay it. Whether the Government is now willing to carry this insurance during the war and after the war for a time or not, Congress will repeal this law sooner or later. I am speaking of the well soldier, not those that have been disabled or who have lost their lives.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman remember when the bill was being debated on the floor the proposition was made that the Pension Bureau be used for this particular work, and that it was resisted by gentlemen who were advocates of this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am frank to tell you that I was not fully informed at that time; if I had, I would have opposed the bill.

I had the impression that any pensionable feature of the bill would be under the jurisdiction of the Pension Bureau.

If no pension or compensation legislation had been enacted covering military and naval service in the present war, all claims for death and disability incurred in such war would have been adjudicated in the Bureau of Pensions, in accordance with the existing general pension law; and that is what I supposed would be done. No action on the part of Congress was necessary to have all claims based on disability contracted in service and line of duty. Such claims were provided for under the general pension law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The proposition was made to use the Pension Bureau, and it was vigorously resisted by those who were proponents of the bill on the theory that it could not be used for that purpose.

Mr. FORDNEY. Gentlemen, there is no justification to-day in continuing in existence this Bureau of War Risk Insurance, so far as the compensation of the soldier for disabilities received in the Army is concerned; none whatever. That is a pension pure and simple and is going to continue to be one, and I want this Government to be generous to the poor fellow who has lost an arm or a leg or an eye or his reason. I want to see that compensation sufficient to care for him the balance of his life in a respectable manner. But there is no justification for this appropriation. I call your attention to the fact that here are more than 635,000 pensions being cared for, for a little over $1,350,000. The entire enlistment in this war is about 4,000,000, and to-day it is costing us $17,000,000 for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and less than 500,000 casualties reported.

Mr. MADDEN. How would they be able to keep these clerks if we did not make this appropriation? Of course, we have got to keep them, whether there is work for them or not.

Mr. FORDNEY. The clerks ought to be kept at home in the pursuit of business, where labor now can not be found to do the work that is to be done. And yet I am told there is a bill before this House to exclude from the United States all immigration for the next four or five years. Some gentlemen come in here shouting about the high cost of living. The high cost of living is going to continue so long as the high cost of production continues, gentlemen. What is the use of playing the part of a demagogue? Why not tell the truth? We know that the man who advocates low cost of living and high cost of production is one of two things, he is either dishonest or a blamed fool.

Therefore, gentlemen, I say the time is coming and is close at hand when, for reasons of economy and efficiency, this war-risk insurance must be discontinued as a Government activity, and the compensation, pension, feature of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance act must be merged with the Pension Bureau.

That fact is patent to me, and I feel confident that an examination of the history of the two bureaus will convince any reasonable mind of the correctness of my conclusions.

The act providing compensation, pension, for death or disability contracted in line of duty in the military or naval service of the United States in the war with Germany was passed October 6, 1917. It placed the jurisdiction over such claims in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. That bureau has 13,000 or more employees, so I am told.

Out of the number of employees engaged on the compensation claims, possibly 1 or 2 per cent have had some experience in similar work. The great bulk of them had no previous experience. While the character of the work was old, it was new to the people to whom it was given by law to do. The office was a newly created and newly organized one, made up of inexperienced personnel and without the aid of necessary physical machinery.

It is not surprising or astonishing that under such conditions the organization has failed to function satisfactorily and that its failure has become notorious. You are all familiar with the conditions or with the complaints growing out of them and know as well that there must be a remedy provided.

As was so well said by my friend FULLER the other day:

> Since the foundation of the Republic all of the pensions paid to soldiers, seamen, and marines have been paid through the Pension Bureau. All of the archives relating to such claims are on file in the Pension Bureau. This comprehends the War of the Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, and the various Indian wars.

So the Pension Bureau has had jurisdiction over all claims for pension based on death or disability contracted in line of duty in the United States military or naval service in all wars and during time of peace up to October 6, 1917. After that date jurisdiction is vested in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in all cases in which the soldier or sailor was then or thereafter in service, unless the right to pension accrued before that date.

The Bureau of Pensions is quartered in the Pension Office Building, a building constructed expressly for its work, and is perhaps superior to any other office building in Washington for its purpose. You are all familiar with its dimensions, its large, well-lighted, and ventilated court and rooms, the rooms receiving light from the outside as well as from the court. It is supplied with all necessary modern machinery required for preparation and payment of pensions or compensation.

The Bureau of Pensions has an experienced force of employees, trained in the work of adjudication of claims. The employees number less than 1,000, and, in my judgment, an increase of that force of not to exceed 500 would be wholly adequate to perform all of the functions of the Pension Office, together with that part of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance devoted to the settlement of claims for compensation, and to perform the work with reasonable promptness.

The Bureau of Pensions has not only a trained, experienced, and well-disciplined office force, medical and legal, but it has local boards of examining surgeons, single surgeons, and specialists located conveniently throughout the United States in probably 1,500 places. These surgeons have been selected by reason of their skill in medicine and surgery and have had long experience.

The Bureau of Pensions also has a skilled and experienced force of special examiners for field work, which is necessary for the protection of the Government incident to the aid it gives to proper settlement of just claims.

Now, the cost of the administration of the Bureau of Pensions for the year ending June 30, 1919, will not exceed the sum of $1,322,620, as that is the total amount appropriated for that purpose. The amount carried in the current appropriation bill is $1,246,540.

If the compensation feature of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance be transferred to the Bureau of Pensions, the additional cost for the administration of the latter bureau will be substantially only the amount required for salaries of 500 or less clerks. The aggregate salaries of 500 clerks, at an average of $1,400 a year, would be $700,000, which, added to the amount carried in the pending appropriation bill, would be $1,946,540.

Now, if you can ascertain the present cost of the administration of the compensation division of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, you can easily determine accurately which bureau will the more economically administer the law. There can be no doubt that by reason of their thorough knowledge of such work and long experience the clerical force of the Pension Bureau can accomplish the work more efficiently and expeditiously at this time. The employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance no doubt will, if kept at the work long enough, become experienced and efficient in the adjudication of compensation or pension claims, but why take the time to educate so many of them at great expense when the work can be done by a capable force already receiving pay for similar work and who, with slight increase in number, can take on the combined pension and compensation work of both bureaus?

I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I had reserved eight minutes for the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE]. He was very anxious when we were agreeing upon time to-day to have some time and for the last half hour I have been endeavoring to locate him. But I do not find him in the Chamber. Of course, I now yield those eight minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE]. But he is not present, as it happens, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] first.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, this Bureau of War Risk Insurance has been chewed on here by everybody that wanted a football to kick around, and I have been silent most of the time for the simple reason that I know that the business down there has not been carried on like I thought it should have been carried on, and the letters have not been answered, and matters have not been looked after in a great many instances like I think they should have been. I have also been quite a good deal disgusted because I have found few men who have been responsible for the conduct of the bureau who were willing to take suggestions, but who have been overambitious to have the credit of putting the thing over; but I realize that it has been one of the greatest tasks in the Government, and I have not publicly criticized them, as I have tried to hold myself in a helpful attitude at all times. I think that now we have a director who, if given support, will bring the whole bureau up to an efficient standard soon. But I find that about 75 per cent of the criticism of this bureau is a senseless criticism. It is a criticism by men who do not know the provisions of this law, just like the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who has just taken his seat.

He said in the beginning that he did not understand that certain things were contained in this bill when the law was passed. That is not the only thing that he does not understand about this law, as he evidenced in his statement here. He says that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, except the compensation end, would cease soon after the war closed, and that the Bureau of Insurance will lapse or be taken into some old-line insurance company.

That is exactly in the teeth of everything that the movers of this legislation expected of it. Everybody knows who has ever read the law with understanding that the Government insurance is not only for the dead soldiers and their beneficiaries, not only for the cripples and maimed soldiers and those whose health has been impaired in the Army to such an extent that they can not get other insurance in a private company, but it will be carried on for all who have been in the Army. It would be merciless indeed to turn them out upon the world by discontinuing the insurance where they can not get insurance after their insurability has been destroyed by their service in the Army. Not only that, but in order to keep this insurance section a going concern, we have provided that the insurance shall go on as to every man in the Army who at this time has taken out insurance and wants to carry it on.

Of course the gentleman from Michigan did not understand, either, when he said that this insurance would mount higher and higher each year until it would become prohibitive. He does not seem to understand that a provision is in the law to the effect that this renewable yearly term insurance is not to carried on after the war is over, but that every policy that any soldier carries in this insurance section is to be converted within five years into some other kind of insurance. Everybody that knows anything about insurance knows that yearly term renewable insurance is the cheapest insurance in the world that a young man can get, and he knows that in the long run it becomes prohibitive, because it is the highest and most costly insurance in the world.

Now, the proposition indeed was up here to transfer the compensation end of this law to the Pension Office. Reasons were given here why it should not be done. More generous provisions have been made for the crippled and maimed soldiers in this law than has ever been made before in the history of this or any other Government, and the Pension Department of this Government—as every fair man knows who will speak the truth and will listen to it—has become the football of politics in many districts of this country and has become a stench in the nostrils of a lot of people.

That is one reason why we did not put this compensation under the administration of the Pension Office. We tried to make it generous enough then. We believed that we did make it generous enough to take in every man who went into this Army and came out crippled and maimed until he would, more generously than ever before, be taken care of by the Government of the United States, and we tried to fix it so that afterwards we would not have a scandal in Congress, such as we have had in connection with the pensions, of men, making it the football of politics, introducing special bills and by special favors getting them passed, to add to their political prestige at home.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman to tell us, if he will, in what respect the Pension Office has become a stench in the nostrils of good people anywhere?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have heard it almost ever since I was able to read that the Pension Office was made the football of politics in this country.

Mr. RUCKER. That must have been away down South, and surely not where soldiers live. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the reason why Congress did not put it in the Pension Office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to have five minutes for myself. I did not intend to speak before.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] out of my own time that I have been reserving for myself.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not want to take it from the gentleman, but I appreciate it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been yielding time that I had reserved for my own use.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of injecting myself into this debate until I heard the remarks just made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], a gentleman for whom I entertain the very highest regard, both as a distinguished Member of this House and a gentleman of high standing. But I will not sit here and allow a man on either side of the House to make such accusations against the administration of the Pension Bureau as were made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] without a reply. I know that comparisons are odious, and they ought to be, but I say to you, if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has somewhere, in some remote section of this great Republic of ours, heard murmurs of criticisms of the Pension Office, he has heard here in Washington a tumult of protests against the bureau he helped to create—the War Risk Insurance Bureau. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Most of the criticisms I have heard since I have come here have been put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. RUCKER. In what respect is the Bureau of Pensions a stench in the nostrils of men? It ministers to the wants of the afflicted, it cares for the soldier's widow and her children, and it gives efficient and prompt attention to all matters coming under its jurisdiction.

Oh, the gentleman said something about special bills, and I have heard that on my side of the House before. [Laughter.] Every now and then it is repeated by some gentleman. But why are special pension bills necessary? It is because the existing pension law does not make proper provision for many of the men who suffered bodily injury and impaired health for their country. Our pension laws do not make the same generous provision for soldiers of the Civil War as this Congress, by almost unanimous vote, made for the relief of the National Army, and for that reason those of us who have seen brave, strong, patriotic, and loyal men, seen them in their helplessness, visited them in their humble homes, and witnessed the evidences of misery and want, have come to Congress, in special cases, and asked Congress to be more liberal and generous than it had been, and by special law grant relief that should be granted, and Congress has usually responded favorably. Is that the cause of the stench? Is it possible that in this great land of ours, where in two wars the North and South have locked arms and marched side by side, bearing that flag to victory—is it possible that anywhere in this land to-day there lives a man who still permits the passions of the Civil War to rankle in his bosom?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; but it does seem that if the pension law is not generous enough the gentleman, with gentlemen on his side, will make it so. They will make it so.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say to this committee that at the time the War Risk Bureau bill was introduced I was one of those who thought the administration of that part of the act relating to compensation, so called, ought to be vested in the Pension Office, and if it had been put there it would have been infinitely more efficiently administered than it is to-day, and I think everybody will admit that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it has been, and I suppose it will be so often, my unpleasant and painful duty to criticize various departments and bureaus of our Government for their conduct of the war, that it is a pleasure on this occasion to testify to the excellent work and the perfect organization of the Surgeon General's office overseas. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKELL] had read the other day a complaint about a case in the Walter Reed Hospital, in Washington. I have no actual information as to this particular hospital or what the Surgeon General's office has been doing in this country during the war, so I asked for a report covering that particular case. I will have the Clerk read the report, which is a full and complete answer to the complaint read into the RECORD the other day. It is but fair to have it before the Members and the country, inasmuch as the other side of the question was presented to the House.

I want to say that our base hospitals overseas were perfect. The work performed by the medical department right near the firing lines was wonderful. The work of our medical corps overseas was a revelation and a lesson to the armies of our allies. It is the one branch that could teach and did not require to learn from others. The sanitary work in our camps kept the disease down to an unprecedented low percentage. The best medical men of the country responded to the call, and fortunately each man was put, as far as practicable, to work for which he has specialized. The medical department of our service overseas came out of this war with a 100 per cent perfect record.

I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the letters which I have received.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Read them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will ask the Clerk to read the letters.

The letters are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, January 13, 1919.

HON. F. H. LAGUARDIA,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LAGUARDIA: With reference to your letter of January 7, in which you inclose a letter from Mr. Jos. J. Lynch and copy of letter addressed to Mr. William A. Graham, all in relation to conditions at the Walter Reed General Hospital, the Surgeon General directs me to inform you that the matter was given prompt and full investigation by one of the distinguished medical authorities on duty in this office, and I am inclosing for your information the complete report, together with the return of all papers forwarded by you.

The return of these papers for file is requested, if convenient, when they have served their purpose.

Very truly, yours,

D. C. HOWARD,
Colonel, Medical Corps.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, January 13, 1919.

From: Lieut. Col. Joseph L. Miller, Medical Corps, United States Army.
To: The Surgeon General, United States Army.
Subject: Investigation of the treatment of pneumonia at Walter Reed Hospital, Takoma Park, D. C.

1. Pursuant to verbal instructions from the Surgeon General's office, I have read the attached letter of Mr. Joseph J. Lynch and have visited Walter Reed Hospital and conferred with the following-named medical officers and nurses:

Col. E. R. Shriner, commanding officer; Maj. B. H. Randolph, chief of the Medical Service; Maj. D. M. Roberts, assistant chief of Medical Service; Maj. Henry F. Stoll, medical inspector; Capt. D. M. Bloom, assistant adjutant; Capt. C. H. Hayes, receiving officer; Capt. Edward C. Durgin, officer of the day (Dec. 18, 1918); Miss R. Stewart, chief nurse; Miss F. M. Poole, night supervisor of nurses; Miss O. R. Fahl, night nurse on duty, ward 21 (Dec. 18, 1918); Miss Jennie Moore, night nurse on duty, ward 21 (Dec. 18, 1918).

I have furthermore consulted the hospital record of Maj. Thomas M. Lynch and inspected the hospital building where he was placed during his last illness.

2. The hospital record of Maj. Thomas M. Lynch shows that he was admitted to Walter Reed Hospital slightly before midnight of December 17, 1918; that he died at 11.30 p. m., December 18, 1918. The following medical history appears on the record: "Began six days, chills, fever, headache pain. Next day went to work, returned at noon, and since then has been in bed. Symptoms have increased. Cough began and has persisted since. Vomited once in past three days. Much dizziness and very weak from the first." "Patient looks very ill; color bad, with considerable cyanosis, dusky in appearance." "Definite consolidation, dullness, bronchial breathing upper right lobe back and front. Whole back and axilla filled with crackling moist râles." "Examination December 18, 12 noon, patient admitted in a critical condition, color bad, cyanosis and lungs pretty generally filled up." "2.30 p. m., December 18, given intravenously left arm about 150 c. c. citrated blood from influenza-pneumonia patient type I. Patient's blood type I." "4 p. m., patient moved to porch, second floor." "Patient died 11.30 p. m., condition becoming worse and more critical as time passed. Lungs filling more and more."

The hospital record furthermore shows that the patient's temperature on admission was 104°, pulse 100, respiration 32. His drug medication was digitalis, camphorated oil, and strychnine.

3. Col. E. R. Shriner, the commanding officer, stated that there were two medical officers on night duty, and that there was no rule that a medical officer should not be called in case the nurse considered that a patient was worse.

4. Maj. Randolph, chief of the medical service, states that Capt. Keys, the ward surgeon in ward No. 21, reported to him on the morning of December 18, 1918, that a Maj. Lynch, who had been admitted to the hospital on the night previous, was very ill with pneumonia. He requested Capt. Keys to have Maj. Stoll, a specialist in disease of the lungs, see Maj. Lynch.

5. Maj. Henry F. Stoll states that on the morning of December 18, 1918, Capt. Keys informed him that he had a very sick officer, Maj. Lynch, in ward No. 21. Maj. Stoll found Maj. Lynch in a very critical condition, and the physical examination previously cited in this report was written at that time by Capt. Keys. He furthermore reports that the patient was stuporous and could only be aroused with difficulty. Capt. Keys was the ward surgeon in charge of Maj. Lynch, but he is now temporarily absent from the hospital on sick report.

6. Maj. D. M. Roberts, assistant chief of the medical service, was called to the phone by the adjutant and talked to Mr. John Lynch over the long-distance phone on the morning of December 18, 1918. Mr. Lynch asked about his brother's condition, and requested him in case additional nurses were required or an outside medical consultant to make such arrangements and he, Mr. Lynch, would see that the bills were paid. Maj. Roberts does not recall that Mr. Lynch stated that in case it was necessary he would bring nurses with him from New York. Maj. Roberts informed Mr. Lynch that he would communicate at once with the ward surgeon regarding Maj. Lynch. This he did, and Capt. Keys reported that the patient's condition was very critical.

7. Capt. E. C. Durgin, officer of the day on December 18, 1918, states that he first saw Maj. Lynch about 10.30 p. m. December 18. His brother, Mr. John Lynch, was present. Mr. Lynch asked Capt. Durgin whether he thought oxygen would do any good; he replied that Maj. Lynch was then dying, and oxygen would not benefit him. Mr. Lynch also asked if he thought it might be advisable to secure a medical consultant from New York. Capt. Durgin replied that his brother had at most only a few hours to live, and hence it would not be advisable to send to New York for a consultant. Capt. Durgin stayed with the patient about 40 minutes, and during all this time a nurse was present.

8. Capt. C. H. Hayes, the receiving officer, stated that Mr. John Lynch came to him late in the evening of December 18 and asked him if oxygen could be secured for his brother. Capt. Hayes informed him that this was a matter for the ward surgeon, as it was not his duty. During his conversation with Mr. John Lynch a nurse called up asking Capt. Hayes to inform Mr. Lynch that he had better return to ward No. 21, as his brother was very low. Later that night, after Maj. Lynch had died, Capt. Hayes talked with Mr. Lynch, and he did not criticize the treatment his brother had received, but seemed satisfied that he had received the proper attention.

9. Capt. D. M. Bloom, the assistant adjutant, was questioned regarding the difficulty Mr. Lynch is reported to have had in determining over the long-distance phone whether his brother was in the hospital. The assistant adjutant stated that a period of several hours elapses after a patient is admitted to the hospitals before lists can be made out from which the adjutant can promptly acquire this data.

10. Miss R. Stewart, chief nurse, reported that nurses were instructed in case a patient developed unfavorable symptoms to communicate at once with the night supervisor, who in turn would give the information to one of the two medical officers always on duty during the night. She also stated that the night supervisor now on duty was extremely careful to communicate with medical officer in case she was informed that a patient had developed any unfavorable symptoms. There had been during December a shortage of nurses, due to inability to secure additional Army or civilian trained nurses.

11. Miss F. M. Poole, the night supervisor, stated that she does not recall any request from the nurse in ward No. 21 regarding Maj. Lynch.

12. Miss F. R. Fahl, the nurse on night duty on the first floor of ward No. 21, recalls having seen Maj. Lynch during the short period when she was called to the second floor to relieve the nurse there at meal time.

13. Miss Jennie Moore was on night duty on the second floor of ward No. 21 when Maj. Lynch was a patient there. She does not recall when he entered the hospital, but recalls distinctly the evening he died. She states that Maj. Lynch's brother reached the hospital about 9 or 10 p. m., December 18, 1918. He asked if a special nurse might be secured for his brother. She replied that she could see if this were possible, and a Miss Kane was sent and remained as special nurse with Maj. Lynch until his death. At no time did Mr. John Lynch suggest or offer her a fee in order to facilitate this request. She does not recall that Mr. Lynch mentioned that his brother had insufficient bedding. In case such a request had been made there were adequate extra blankets in the ward. She does not recall that Mr. Lynch complained that his brother was not receiving proper attention. She also stated that the nurses did not have orders not to disturb the medical officer in case a patient became worse.

14. Miss Kane, the special nurse, is not now at Walter Reed Hospital.

15. Ward No. 21 was visited. It is a three-story brick building, built for a contagious ward. Each floor has a normal capacity for about 12 patients. The first floor is used for sick nurses. The other two floors for sick soldiers. Each floor has single rooms and small wards, the largest with a normal capacity of four beds. An inclosed veranda extends along the south side of the building. This veranda is divided in the middle by a partition. Each section has three double French windows reaching from the floor to the ceiling. The floor is cement. The wards were clean and orderly.

16. The above-mentioned veranda is a most satisfactory place for treating pneumonia patients. It is essential that a very ill pneumonia patient, with rapid respiration, be placed in a current of air in order to assure the carrying away of the expired air before the next inspiration. This is recognized as one of the essentials in the fresh-air treatment of pneumonia.

17. Oxygen at the present time is little used in the treatment of pneumonia. The best authorities consider that it has little if any value. Patients die as the result of the severe toxemia rather than from insufficient oxygen.

18. Few pneumonia patients in private life have a physician call as often as every three hours. With a medical officer always available, and the nurse instructed to call him in case untoward symptoms develop, it would seem that rounds by the physician every three hours would be quite adequate.

19. As shown by the record, Maj. Lynch was carefully examined and treatment along accepted lines promptly instituted. He even had the benefit of the most recent discovery in the treatment of influenza-pneumonia, viz, the use of convalescent serum.

20. This investigation shows that Maj. John Lynch entered the Walter Reed Hospital six days after the onset, critically ill with influenza-pneumonia. He died 24 hours later. The medical attention he received there, both from a diagnostic and therapeutic standpoint, was of the highest character. There is no evidence that the hospital was guilty of neglect.

JOS. L. MILLER.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, so much time has been consumed in the general debate on this bill, and it is so exceedingly important that this House should proceed to pass the pending appropriation bills at an early date, that I trust when we come to the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule gentlemen of the committee will confine themselves as closely as possible to the provisions of the bill. There will, of course, be no disposition on the part of anyone to prevent a full and thorough discussion of any of the provisions in the bill, but I trust that the debate will be confined to the bill itself.

Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee which was charged with the duty of preparing this bill was probably faced with the most difficult task that has ever been faced by any subcommittee that has had charge of a similar bill. This bill makes an appropriation for services of certain employees of the Government for the fiscal year immediately following the war, and it was manifestly impossible for the heads of the departments and the heads of the different bureaus in the city of Washington to state with any particular definiteness how much they would need in their governmental activities while we are passing from a war to a peace basis. Your committee, therefore, I say, have had considerable difficulty in arriving at just what sums will be needed during the next fiscal year. There may be cases in this bill where too much has been appropriated, although I doubt that very much. There are probably in the bill items where possibly too little has been appropriated for the next fiscal year; but your committee was not unmindful of the fact that in such cases, as the year progresses and the work necessary in the departments develops, Congress will be in a better position to judge accurately at the next session in December, and if additional money is needed can provide it by way of a deficiency bill.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Does the gentleman think that statement refers to the salaries of Congressmen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was referring more particularly to the salaries of some of the more poorly paid Government employees.

I want to refer specially to the services rendered by my colleagues upon the subcommittee, the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. They have rendered very long, faithful, and arduous services in the preparation of this bill.

The committee went into session in hearings upon the estimates submitted on this bill on November 20, and for weeks was engaged constantly during the day and in many night sessions in holding hearings, endeavoring to ascertain the facts necessary for the proper preparation of this bill. We had presented to us requests for general increases of salaries, ranging from positions of assistant secretaries in departments, from $5,000 to $7,500, down to $2,000 and less, increases which amounted to more than $900,000 for this bill alone. These increases were not submitted to Congress under the law which requires that original estimates shall be submitted through the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker, and thence transmitted to the proper committees, but they were submitted by way of supplemental estimates, no reason being assigned as to why they were not submitted in the original estimates. In addition to that, every department requested that increases be given to what may be called the mechanical force of the particular department.

I am not able to tell you just how much those increases would have amounted to, because no estimates were submitted and no data given the committee as to the number to which it would apply and as to how much the aggregate sum would be. Your committee felt that it was impossible on an appropriation bill, and particularly at the short session of Congress, to undertake such an investigation as would justify it in reporting a general salary increase bill to this Congress. In addition to that, in so far as the mechanical help of the departments is concerned, you will recall that this House has passed what is known as the Nolan minimum-wage bill, and that bill is now pending in the Senate. If it is the desire of Congress to raise the mechanical help and the lower-paid help of the departments to a rate of not less than $3 a day, it is very easy, of course, for the Senate to take that bill up and pass it, and if signed by the President it would become a law, the House having already acted. The result is that your committee has not recommended any general increases of salary in this bill. There are a very few that have been increased, and we will come to them as we proceed with the reading of the bill. In order to meet the demand—and there is a general demand—for increases of salary among a great many of the employees of the Government, and do what I think is common justice to the employees of this Government, the committee has recommended the creation of a joint commission to make investigation, conduct such hearings as are necessary, and report to Congress with reference to a reclassification and readjustment of the salaries paid to employees.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. When you reported this bill you took it for granted that the Senate would pass the Nolan bill; otherwise you would have recommended an increase?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not want to leave the gentlemen under that impression, because I have no information as to what the Senate will do with reference to the Nolan bill. As I stated, it was manifestly impossible for this committee at the short session to undertake to go fully into what is being paid to the employees of this Government, as compared with what is being paid for similar services in private employment, not only here in the District of Columbia but throughout the country. And in addition to that, even if that investigation had been made and the committee had determined there were salaries which ought to be increased, it was impossible to include them on an appropriation bill under the rules of the House, because they would have been subject to a point of order. The point I make with reference to the Nolan bill is this: The House has passed the Nolan bill, and it is now pending in the Senate. If it is the desire of Congress to give to all employees of the Government not less than $3 a day as a minimum wage, it will be very easy for the Senate to take that bill up and pass it.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I fully agree with the gentleman in this proposition to create a commission. I think this thing ought to be looked into thoroughly, so that we can arrive at some understanding to do those people justice.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am very glad the gentleman has made that statement. As a matter of fact, there has been no general reclassification and readjustment of salaries since about 1850.

Mr. LAZARO. And it ought to be done.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the gentleman well says, it ought to be done.

Mr. DENISON. What is the provision for the commission?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It provides for the appointment of a joint commission of 10, 5 Senators to be appointed by the Vice President, who shall be Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, and 5 Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, who shall also be Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, and appropriates $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to provide this commission with proper clerical assistance. While I am on the subject of salaries I might say that the committee has recommended to the House a continuance of the provision of $120 a year which is carried in the current law and with which all of you are familiar.

The estimates submitted to the committee for this bill amounted to $120,017,637.63. The total appropriations made for the current fiscal year amount to $89,182,145.98, and this bill which is recommended to the House carries a total of $96,306,891.75, or about $7,000,000 more than the appropriation for the current year. That increase is made up of two items which were not considered in the current bill, or at least an increase of one item, and a new item. This bill carries $15,000,000 for the taking of the next census, which will begin January 1, 1920, and it carries an appropriation of several million dollars more than is carried in the current law for the collection of internal revenue. If these items are taken from the bill, this bill would really be a considerable reduction over the expenses for the current year.

It is not my purpose to undertake a discussion of this bill in detail. That can best be done as we proceed with the reading of the bill. I wanted to call attention to a few of the main outstanding features of the bill. We have provided, as I stated, $15,000,000 for the taking of the next census. That is not all that the Director of the Census says will be necessary. He submitted an estimate to the committee for $20,500,000, which would be sufficient to entirely take the census, according to his figures, and would also provide for the permanent force of the census for a period of three years.

But he stated in the hearings that it would be impossible to expend more than $15,000,000, if that much, during the next fiscal year, and your committee was unwilling to recommend an appropriation for an amount that was admittedly more than he could possibly expend during the period of this bill. This bill carries an appropriation of $4,000,000 by way of lump sum for the War Department, which is a considerable reduction over the current law and also a considerable reduction of the estimates which were submitted.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Were not the estimates submitted by the War Department made up before the signing of the armistice, and were they not figured upon a war-time basis for that department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. TILSON. Which would necessarily be very much higher than a peace-time basis in the fiscal year 1920?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true, but after the signing of the armistice the War Department submitted amended estimates of what they would need during the fiscal year 1920 on a peace basis, and it was to that estimate I referred when I said this was less.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman has reduced the revised estimate of the War Department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. In other words, the original estimate which was submitted prior to the signing of the armistice, my recollection is, called for $32,000,000. Now, after the signing of the armistice, the War Department revised this estimate and submitted estimates which called for $5,940,570, stating that it was expected that that sum would provide for 4,977 additional employees. The amount recommended by the committee, at an average salary of approximately $1,200, would approximately care for 3,300 persons, or 1,600 less than had been requested. Now, I do not know, I am frank to say, whether that will be sufficient or not. My judgment is that the War Department will find that that sum is entirely sufficient as the fiscal year progresses, although it is certain that The Adjutant General's Office will require a greatly increased force. In this estimate it was stated that The Adjutant General would probably require $2,900,000 alone. As I say, I do not think as the year progresses any such sum as that will be required, yet the committee felt that if it was mistaken, and if by any chance it did allow too little, Congress would be in session and be better able to pass on what was needed at the next winter session than now, six months prior to the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Did not the Secretary of War recently make an estimate asking for $6,000,000 mainly for additional clerk hire?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; it amounted to $5,940,000 to be exact.

Mr. MANN. That was after this bill had been——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; that estimate was presented to the committee while it was having its hearings, and we had that estimate before us when the hearings on the War Department were conducted.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think there was an estimate submitted in the last few days of $6,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, well, the gentleman means for a deficiency; the gentleman refers to a deficiency?

Mr. MANN. That is what I wanted to ask, whether that was for a deficiency for the balance of this fiscal year—$6,000,000 for additional clerk hire?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is my understanding; but I am frank to say I have not seen the estimate. The estimate referred to by the gentleman is for a deficiency for the remainder of the fiscal year. Now, gentlemen, for the Navy Department this bill carries for additional employees $1,046,000, which is a reduction from $1,210,686.73 provided for the current year and a reduction from the estimate submitted to the committee, which was $1,607,740. The Navy Department at the time our hearings were conducted had in the District of Columbia a total of 6,275 persons, with pay aggregating an annual rate of $7,729,293.28, which was made up as follows: Statutory employees on the regular roll, 723; total salary, $818,260; temporary additional employees, 1,263; total salary, $1,516,260.16; and reserves to the number of 4,289, with a total salary of $5,354,773.12.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in regard to the practice of these different departments. You are making appropriations of so much money to pay for the additional help in the War Department, for example, and also in the Navy Department. What I want to know is, What is the practice of those departments? In the event you do not make sufficient appropriations, do the heads of the different departments go right on employing this help they feel they need and then come in with a deficiency appropriation and ask Congress to pay the bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The law provides where a lump sum is provided that it shall be apportioned throughout the year, in 12 equal installments, month by month, but it also gives to the head of the department the authority to waive that law of apportionment where he deems it necessary for the conduct of the Government's business. Of course, therefore, Congress has no authority, unless it repeals that law, to regulate the amount of money that shall be used during the month unless it proceeds in the bill to say how much shall be used month by month.

Mr. McKENZIE. In peace time you provide in this legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for a certain specific number of clerks, as I understand it, and, of course, the heads of the departments can not add to that number without the authority of Congress, but now during this war time or period is it possible that Congress has not the power to demobilize this great force of clerks down there, but they can go on and keep them on the roll and then come in with a deficiency bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Congress has undoubtedly power to reduce the appropriations, of course, and decline to give permission to employ the clerks. They can not employ them unless they have an appropriation, and this bill, while it carries $4,000,000 for the War Department, provides for a reduction from the amount of about $18,000,000 which, I understand, is needed for the current year. So you see that in itself is quite a demobilization.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand that; but, for instance, the deficiency the gentleman just spoke of a few moments ago, which the Secretary of War is asking for, is to pay for help. Now, the appropriation is a certain amount of money?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. When that was exhausted they do not keep taking on clerks, I understand, but come in with a deficiency?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; the original appropriation was something over $10,000,000, but, as I stated, under the law the Secretary of War had the right to waive the necessity of apportioning that money month by month where an emergency arose which, in his opinion, warranted such action, and I assume that was so in this case.

Mr. McKENZIE. He can do the same thing under this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He can.

Now, it appears that the Navy Department expects to continue the employment of a force of 2,572 reserves, even though they were allowed the 1,785 additional employees which were asked of Congress in this bill. For my part, gentlemen, I think it is a bad practice to employ reserves in peace times here in Washington to perform clerical service. I think that work ought to be done by civilians. But since it was stated that 2,572 reserves were to be employed anyway, and since your committee had no jurisdiction of legislation with reference to the employment of reserves here in the Navy Department, your committee felt thoroughly warranted in reducing this sum to a little over a million dollars for about 800 employees.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I was wondering whether in the face of the fact that the Navy Department has decided under the Naval Establishment to retain 2,500 reserves as clerks if it would not be a good thing to cut out all the civilian clerks and let them run the department with reserves, inasmuch as this committee has no jurisdiction to do anything else?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that would be advisable if it was proper to employ reserves in peace times.

Mr. MADDEN. I know; but inasmuch as this committee has no jurisdiction to direct the removal of reserves, and the department insists on retaining them, and at the same time insists on the employment of civilian clerks, if there is no other way around to reach the matter of the economical administration of the affairs of the department this committee could refuse to appropriate for the civilian clerks until they found out when the department was going to let go of the reserves.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think what Congress ought really to do is to refuse to provide for the reserves.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman said they had no jurisdiction over them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And they should require the Navy Department to submit estimates here as to the extent of the clerical force they would need during the fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman raise a point of order against an amendment that would do that in this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To cut out the reserves?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The reserves are not carried in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand; but we might put a provision in this bill that would prevent their being carried any other place.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would feel compelled at the present time to say I would for this reason: They evidently have not estimated here for anything like the force that will be needed by the Navy Department, and I think if we were first to cut out the reserves, without giving the Navy Department an opportunity to come before some committee to show the civilian force they need, it might do the department an injustice.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought, maybe, that if we could eliminate the reserves that are acting as clerks in the department, and we did not leave enough civilian clerks to do the work, we could supply them in the bill before it got through the Senate.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state of what these reserves consist? Are they men or women, or both?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They consist of both sexes, but the majority are women.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman know as a matter of fact that they get more pay than civil-service employees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand that many of them do.

Mr. DYER. The employees who have been there for years are getting less pay than these reserves.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that is true in some instances. That is another reason why I think the employment of reserves in peace times in the Navy Department should be abandoned.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. EMERSON. I find in this bill in several places provisions for the employment of people by name. Why is that in the bill? Now, for instance, in the Senate I find Henry M. Rose, at $5,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Where is that?

Mr. EMERSON. That is on page 2; Henry M. Rose, $5,000, and on page 17, for the employment of Joel Grayson in the document room.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is due to the fact that Congress many years ago—I do not know just when—passed a joint resolution placing those particular men on the rolls at the salaries named in the bill, and hence the appropriations in the bill are framed to take care of them by name because they were named in the joint resolution.

Mr. EMERSON. They are permanently employed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are permanently employed until Congress sees fit to repeal the resolution.

I want to hurriedly refer to two or three matters. We have included in this bill a provision in reference to war materials so as to provide that the excess materials and supplies in the various departments which have accumulated on account of the war may be used by other departments.

The President issued an Executive order covering these excess general supplies into the custody and care of the General Supply Committee, and the provision that we have recommended makes provision for their sale by this General Supply Committee to the departments and bureaus of the Government that may need them.

This bill undertakes to eliminate all the provisions for rent that are being made here in the District of Columbia, with the exception of certain buildings which are under lease by the Government. There are a number of buildings like the building occupied by the Department of Labor, the Civil Service Commission, and other establishments, which are under lease for a period of years. Some of these leases run to 1921, 1922, and 1923. Of course, in these cases it is necessary for the Congress to make an appropriation to carry out the terms of the leases.

Then there is another building the lease of which expires June 30. That is the building occupied by the Department of Commerce. Your committee felt that it was hardly in accordance with the dignity of that great department to undertake to put it in one of these temporary wooden buildings down here in the park, and hence we have recommended to Congress that the Secretary of Commerce be given authority to enter into another lease for five years at the end of the present term of the lease. But with the exception of a few other buildings which appear in the bill, this committee has eliminated all the rent, amounting to more than $600,000, that is being paid private owners here in Washington.

It was stated by Mr. Dorr, who has charge of this matter, that the total net space available in temporary buildings is 3,994,000 square feet. He has received requests from certain activities of the Government for 761,000 square feet, which will be taken care of by June 30 of this year, and he estimates that after all these requests are taken care of he will then have an additional 500,000 square feet which will be available for assignment to other branches of the Government.

Your committee felt, inasmuch as these buildings are suitable for office purposes, and inasmuch as they will be vacant, it would be a waste and an extravagance to undertake to rent private buildings here in the city of Washington when the Government has sufficient available space to take care of all its business, and hence, as I say, we eliminated more than $600,000 in rent from this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MANN. What buildings does the gentleman refer to? He said "these buildings." What buildings does he refer to?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Government buildings?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have reference to these temporary buildings down here in Henry and Seaton Parks and in the Mall, and then also to a number of buildings, the Food Administration Building and the Fuel Administration Building, whch are down near Potomac Park, and the War Trade Building, which is on Government land on Fourteenth Street.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the position of the gentleman and of the committee is that these temporary buildings which were put up in parks are to remain there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. The committee recognized full well that it will be impossible for these buildings to be occupied more than a few years, because they are temporary in character.

Mr. MANN. They are temporary in character, of course, and they may fall down, and can not be used very long; but in the meantime they can repair them and keep them up. I had hoped that the committee or Congress would attempt at the very earliest possible moment to restore the parks and tear down these temporary buildings just as fast as they could get the people out.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I feel sure that many of these buildings will be torn down, even if this provision goes in, eventually, because they will not all be needed.

Mr. MANN. Just those that are needed will remain. But the Government activities are such, the demand for space is such, that as soon as any portion of the Government, the Congress or the House of Representatives, and any one of the various departments finds that there is additional space that can be obtained they always want to occupy more room. There never will be space enough created for the Government to satisfy the desire of people for more room. We have had experience of that in connection with our own offices.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I thought that possibly if this provision were adopted it might serve to aid some gentlemen who are endeavoring to have the Government put up more buildings. For my part I have always thought it was a shame that the Government of the United States, rich and powerful as it is, did not own its own buildings and house its employees under its own roof, and I hope the time will come soon when we will have buildings of that character. And when I say that, I do not mean buildings that are put up under the artistic ideas of the Fine Arts Commission, with many expensive columns and little office space, but I mean substantial, good-looking, respectable office buildings.

Mr. EMERSON. And have them grouped together where we can get to them.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I remember hearing Mr. Fitzgerald, of the Committee on Appropriations, discussing this matter on the floor here, and the point was raised at that time about building these buildings in the Mall or in the parks; and he stated that it was the purpose of the committee and its members, so far as he could tell, that they should be only temporary, and should be torn down just as soon as the emergency was over. Is that still the idea of the committee, so far as you know it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is a matter, of course, with which the committee of which I am a member has nothing to do. But I think that is the idea of every Member of Congress, because these buildings are in their very character temporary, although it is stated that some of them might last 5 or 10 years. I see no reason why some of them should be torn down during the next fiscal year, and certainly economy demands that the Government should use them as long as they stand.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They are in a place where they ought not to be. Is not that true?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true, possibly of one or two buildings, but buildings like the Food Administration Building and the Fuel Administration Building and other buildings near Potomac Park do not interfere with any of the parks of the Government. As a matter of fact, they are constructed on leased land, for which the Government is paying 10 cents a square foot per annum.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I imagine it is the intention to move some of the other departments of the Government into these temporary buildings. Is it also intended to move the records of these various activities into these buildings?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There will be no particular permanent records of great value. There will be no records of such value as those of the War Risk Bureau or the Internal-Revenue Service. Departments which have a great volume of records will not be moved there, I take it. The question of what branches of the Government will be moved into these buildings is left with the President.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In other words, there will not be anything taken into these buildings, so far as the gentleman knows, that would be exposed to the hazards of destruction by fire?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no; quite the contrary, I am sure. The Committee has recommended to Congress that the Arlington Building, so called, which is now nearing completion and, I understand, will be ready about February 1, shall be used by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and if there is any excess space, that the Secretary of the Treasury may designate it for other bureaus of the department. Now, representatives of the bureau appeared before the committee and asked for an appropriation of $40,000 to rent the Southern Railway Building, down here near the depot, stating that it was the only building within their knowledge which they could rent which was of fireproof construction. We did not allow that; but inasmuch as it was stated to the House when the Arlington Building was purchased out of the emergency fund of the President, and in the hearing before the Senate committee that it was purchased for the War Risk Bureau, we felt that the War Risk Bureau should be put into that building, especially since, as has been stated on the floor this morning, it is now spread out in 15 buildings over the city, and that is one of its chief excuses, and I think justified to a certain extent, for its failure to render the prompt service that we all hoped it would render in the case of allotments and allowances.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. SLOAN. Did Congress ever authorize the investment of its funds in this Arlington Hotel property, so called?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The $4,200,000 which was used in purchasing that building was set apart by the President out of the emergency fund which Congress had theretofore placed in the hands of the President.

Mr. SLOAN. That emergency fund was distinctively a war-chest fund and not a real estate or construction fund.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was an emergency fund for war purposes undoubtedly. There are many purposes to which it might have been legally and properly devoted by the President, and I assume this is one of them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Did not Congress subsequently take some action touching this matter?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think not, although it was discussed in the House.

Mr. GARNER. They reimbursed the $4,200,000, did they not?

Mr. STAFFORD. When did they ever do that?

Mr. GARNER. I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think they ever took such action. In fact, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] was ready to introduce a rule to consider the resolution providing for the purchase of that building when Mr. McAdoo went ahead and purchased it out of this fund.

Mr. GARNER. I think they reimbursed that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What is the gentleman's recollection about that? My own recollection is that Congress subsequently authorized the reimbursement of this fund out of which the President had made the payment, and thereby ratified and indorsed what Mr. McAdoo did.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am frank to say to the gentleman that I am not certain that any such action was taken. I do know that the matter was very thoroughly discussed upon the floor of the House, but I do not recall that Congress passed a bill appropriating $4,200,000 for the purpose of reimbursing the President's fund.

Mr. EMERSON. The Government paid for it, just the same, whether out of the President's fund or some other fund.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is paid for, and, to my mind, it is one of the finest buildings that the Government owns here in the city, with one or two exceptions. It is a splendid building, and I have no doubt is fully worth the money paid for it. It contains something over 600,000 square feet of space, and will be more than sufficient to house this great War Risk Bureau.

Now, gentlemen, while I am discussing the War Risk Bureau and the space that has been provided for it, I wish to refer to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois the other day read into the RECORD a number of letters, some of them attacking certain officials in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, one of them in particular undertaking to name three of the employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, to wit, Mr. King, whose initials I do not recall; Mr. Effner, whom I do not know; and Mr. D. A. Jones, who is superintendent of special agents. Mr. King is now a deputy commissioner. Criticism was made in this letter—the gentleman from Illinois expressly stated he did not vouch for the accuracy of the statement—of these gentlemen for having selected what was known as the Hooper-Holmes Bureau to make the investigations required by law as to the allotments and allowances.

This letter intimated, if it did not expressly say so, that the three gentlemen to whom I have referred stood to make a good deal of money as a result of the methods that they had followed in selecting this bureau to make these investigations. I understand full well, as I say, that the gentleman from Illinois did not vouch for that statement. I regret that he did not give the author of the letter, because if he had it might be possible to show—I do not know whether it is the fact or not—that the author of the letter was one of two or three employees who have been discharged from the bureau. But whether that be true or not, I wish to say, in justice to these gentlemen, that I do not think any criticism can be made of them for the manner in which they have selected these special agents to make these investigations. I have known Mr. D. A. Jones for many years; I have known his family, and I can cheerfully testify to his high character and integrity. He is a reputable, splendid gentleman, who came here in a clerical capacity, and who by virtue of his own industry and efficiency has been promoted to be superintendent of investigations in the bureau. As to Mr. King, I never knew him until he appeared before the committee in the hearings. He impressed me then as a man of fine business capacity, and all who know him speak well of him. He is connected in some way—just how I do not know—with the Hooper-Holmes Bureau. I do not know Mr. Effner. The facts are that they were under the necessity of making this investigation under the law. Here were hundreds of thousands of cases all over the country.

They had sent checks for allotments and allowances, because, of course, they realized they could not delay sending out checks to families of soldiers who needed the money while they undertook these many investigations. The question was as to how they should select those to make investigations in every town and in every civil district of the country. More than 110,000 investigators were selected. They appealed to insurance inspection agencies, they appealed to the Red Cross, they appealed to every conceivable source for a list of men capable of making these investigations. They took a list of the American Bar Association and sent a letter, I am informed, to every member of the American Bar Association telling him that while they knew he would not be particularly interested in the $1 which was all that was paid for any particular case, yet it was hoped, from the standpoint of patriotism and desire to serve the country, that he would assist in such investigations. Many of them did it as a pure matter of patriotism, because the sum of $1 was not sufficient compensation for the work required in many of these cases. Out of the 110,000 investigators on the rolls, they tell me, 60,000 are active, and I am informed that representatives of the Hooper-Holmes Bureau are serving in only about five States. I submit that in cases where only $1 is paid for an investigation, where the fee is not paid by either one of these three gentlemen, but is paid through the disbursing officer of the bureau, there is not the slightest opportunity for either one of them, if so inclined, to profit at the expense of the Government in the investigation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The statements which I read in the House were read some time ago. They could easily be denied if they were not true. The gentleman has not denied any of them yet. I have been appealed to by various gentlemen not to press anything of this kind, because some of these gentlemen were members of the Republican Club of New York, in good standing in the club. It seemed to me, instead of endeavoring to bring political influence to bear upon me, which usually does not have very much effect, they would better deny the statements. Is Mr. King a high official in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; he has been acting as deputy commissioner.

Mr. MANN. Is he a high official in connection with the Hooper-Holmes Bureau?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is my information.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman knows the transaction is improper if he had anything to do with it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know this, without undertaking to argue the propriety of Mr. King having been employed as a deputy commissioner and then employing the investigators of his bureau to make these investigations; I feel sure that there has not been any graft to those in charge here in Washington in these investigations throughout the country, for this reason: In the first place, it has been difficult, I am informed, to even get men to make these investigations for $1, because they insist that it is worth four or five times that much. In addition to that, I am told that when these reports come in they are first submitted to those in charge of the investigation section, and if they are found to be proper and the person making the report has complied with the instructions of the bureau, then his name is certified to the disbursing office and a check for the amount due is sent directly to him. I submit that in order for anyone here in Washington to profit it would be necessary to have some arrangement with the whole 60,000 investigators over the country for a refund of a part of the dollar that might be sent him in this or that case.

Mr. MANN. If the Hooper-Holmes Bureau is making a large amount of money out of this and Mr. King as deputy commissioner of this bureau was instrumental in having that company get the work in which he is interested, I can very readily see an opportunity of making considerable money whether it is called graft or otherwise. As to whether the investigations which have been made are worth $1, that is another thing. I doubt whether any investigation is made in most of these cases that is worth 5 cents. I happen to know of some cases where I know the investigations took no time and it is not worth a nickel.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am informed that as a result of these investigations about $900,000 per month remains in the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, I suppose, means that a lot of those allowances have been revoked, namely, upon reports made directly to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and in most cases it has been an outrageous revocation.

Mr. GARNER. Not in most cases.

Mr. MANN. In many cases, without investigation, without knowledge.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman referred to an investigation by Congress. I think that if there is the least scintilla of evidence of facts to support the charge that any employee of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance has been profiting at the expense of the Government and in violation of law and the obligation that he owes to the Government, there ought to be such an investigation and such person punished.

Mr. MANN. If the Deputy Commissioner of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance has given a contract to a concern of which he is substantial owner, and which receives a large amount of money from the Government, it certainly means that somebody is getting some money out of the Government.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am informed by Mr. King—I give the gentleman as my authority—that the Hooper-Holmes Co. does not receive one cent of the $1 that has been paid to those making these investigations. The Government pays the money direct to the investigator, who is expected to make a close and personal investigation of the cases placed in his hands, and which often requires a good deal of work and the interviewing of a number of persons. Gentlemen must bear in mind that this investigation is required by law, and these officials have been trying to do their duty.

And I hold in my hand a memorandum which was handed me by Mr. King, and also one handed me by Mr. D. A. Jones, which they asked me to do them the justice to present to the House. These gentlemen specifically deny these charges, and I wish them to go into the RECORD so that their side of the matter may be made clear.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman says that no money is paid by the Government to the Hooper-Holmes Co.?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; if I said that I was very unfortunate in my statement.

Mr. MANN. I understood it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What I meant to say was, I am informed by Mr. King that the Hooper-Holmes Bureau receives no part of the money that is paid to any of its agents for making this investigation.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; but is the gentleman also informed that the Hooper-Holmes Co. does not pay the dollar to the agent?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For making this investigation?

Mr. MANN. But only pays a portion of it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The dollar is paid by the Government.

Mr. MANN. To the Hooper-Holmes Co.?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; my information is it is paid directly to the man making the investigation, and the voucher is sent him and not to the Hooper-Holmes Bureau.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman has stated both ways about it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I have been unfortunate. I stated a few moments ago——

Mr. MANN. There is quite a difference in whether the Government is given an opportunity to use the list of people which the Hooper-Holmes Co. has as its own list and pays the men itself or whether the Government has made an arrangement with the Hooper-Holmes Co. and pays the Hooper-Holmes Co. a dollar for each case and the Hooper-Holmes Co. pays a portion of that amount to the men making the investigation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My information is that the Government is only using the list of the Hooper-Holmes Bureau in certain States where they were unable to secure lists through the usual method and that the money which is paid for making the investigation is not paid to the Hooper-Holmes Bureau but paid to each individual who makes this investigation and the report.

Mr. MANN. It is a very easy matter to determine. Why has it not been determined? The letter which I read to the House, which might be supplemented by a statement made to me by a Member of the House who said he had investigated this matter, was that the Hooper-Holmes Co. received a dollar, and whereas it usually had a great many employees working in other insurance cases it did not pay the dollar to the investigator, and that in other insurance cases it took a contract for making the investigation for less than a dollar and still retained a profit after paying the investigator. Now, it is easy to know what the facts are.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I repeat I have here, Mr. Chairman, a statement of Mr. King in the form of a memorandum which he requested me to present to the House, and I ask unanimous consent to insert this, and also a memorandum from Mr. D. A. Jones, in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, which will give the gentleman the full information.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does Mr. King say anything about the point suggested by my colleague in his memorandum?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and explains the whole matter.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why can not it be read now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If you will give me the time I will be glad to read it, but I have not the time, and I was trying to get through so as to yield to the gentleman from Texas the balance of my time. I think it will serve every purpose if it is printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman also place in the RECORD the questionnaire submitted to the various investigators or inspectors, whatever they may be, relative to the right of these beneficiaries to these allotments? I understand that the questions submitted were, at least some of them, subject to criticism. For instance, in a number of them, and I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio for a definite statement, if a mother was claiming allotment from a son the investigator would ask whether or not she was a moral woman, or words to that effect?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have never had an opportunity to see one of the questionnaires, and I do not know just what statements are contained in them.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it they were made sufficiently broad in order to give all the information that was necessary for the bureau to act properly on the case. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEARNS. I had sent to my home town, addressed to me as attorney at law, 8 or 10 questionnaires, wanting information relative to a number of allottees in that particular neighborhood. I happened to know personally two of them myself—two mothers. The letter inclosed asked me to state in the place for remarks on each questionnaire whether or not these mothers were moral women. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee what would be the difference whether a mother was moral or not if she had sent two or three sons into the Army and those sons had made an allotment to her. The money belonged to the boys and not to the Government. The Government had agreed with those boys when they left their homes to pay this allotment to the mother, and I could not quite understand what business it was of the department whether the mother happened to be a good woman or a bad woman. The sons wanted her to have the money or they would not have allotted it to her. It was their money.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is the gentleman certain that that was only an allotment, and that it did not carry with it an allowance?

Mr. KEARNS. It carried with it an allowance, yes, in this particular instance. The two sons had gone in November, 1917. It was only a few weeks ago that I received this letter and these questionnaires. This mother had not received even one nickel up to that time. It seems to me if the Government was not satisfied to pay the allowance it ought at least to have paid the $30 that belonged to the sons of this mother, regardless of whether she was a moral woman or not.

Now, in this particular instance to which I refer, because this mother could not get this money from her sons, who had been supporting her for the last six or seven years, to my knowledge, she was compelled to take in washing and do the family laundry for a number of families in this town. She was thus compelled to be away from home through the day, when she was at work, and one of her younger boys caught cold playing in the streets, with no one to look after him, and died. Certainly some one in the department is responsible for that young son's death. I happened to know of this case, and when I got the questionnaires I wrote to the department answering their questions as best I could, but when it came to the place where it asked whether she was moral or not, I wrote in that place "It is none of your d—— business"; and the mother informed me in a week after that she had received the allotment and allowance.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have had many cases called to my attention which I thought were inexcusable, but, on the whole, I think we should take everything into consideration. Here are 4,000,000 applications for allotment and allowance to the War Risk Bureau, a bureau that did not grow gradually, but where all the allowances and allotments were thrust on it at one time. Possibly there may be a little justification for the delay. Gentlemen can appreciate what a stupendous job it was and how very difficult it was not to make some mistakes.

Mr. Chairman, in the preparation of this bill your committee has borne constantly in mind the importance and necessity of retrenching the expenditures of the Government. The expenses incident to the preparation for and the winning of the war were without precedent in the history of this or any other country. Congress, with an eye single and alone upon an early and lasting victory spared no expense necessary to enable those charged with the prosecution of the war to thoroughly equip our soldiers who were so bravely risking their lives in the cause of freedom not only for our own beloved country but for the world at large. During the war money was spent with a lavish hand, and not a single loyal taxpayer complained or would have had it otherwise. A heavy bonded indebtedness which will require years to liquidate was willingly incurred in order that militarism and autocracy might forever perish from the earth. But now the scene has changed. The war has been won. It has cost the lives of many of the noblest and best of our citizenship, and billions in money. But, Mr. Chairman, independence is never purchased at too great a sacrifice. Every true American, not excepting the noble mother who made the supreme sacrifice of her splendid son on the altars of her country, has been willing to make the sacrifice in order to maintain our commercial independence and complete sovereignty and to rid the world of the nightmare of military domination and economic servitude.

This war has taught us many valuable lessons. Chief among them, I trust, is the lesson of frugality, the importance of conserving our food supplies and resources, and the sin of wastefulness and wanton extravagance. On account of our great abundance, the American people had become an extravagant people, wasting vastly more of the actual necessities of life each year than was necessary for their comfort and pleasure. The necessities of war have brought this fact home to the man and woman both on the farm and in the city. And, Mr. Chairman, what is true of the individual should be true of our Government. Our appropriations for years to come will be many times greater than ever before on account of the war, and this increased burden will rest upon the people whom we represent. The time has come when the representatives of the people must give closer attention to the expenditures made by the Government. This does not means that our Government must be parsimonious. It certainly does not mean that those who are employed by the Government shall not receive a wage which will fairly compensate them for the services rendered and enable them not only to live comfortably and decently but to also have some of the real and genuine pleasures of life. It does not mean that the Government shall be unprogressive and fail to make those expenditures which are necessary for the health, happiness, and education of its people. It does not mean that it shall in any way neglect those internal improvements which are so necessary for its complete development or that it shall fail to fully foster and lend proper encouragement to agriculture, industry, and commerce. Quite the contrary. For these are duties which must be assumed by a Government which exists for the people and not for a few favored individuals. But it does mean, Mr. Chairman, that the expenditures of the Government must be closely scrutinized and that all wasteful and unnecessary expenditures must be eliminated. This your committee has very earnestly endeavored to do in the preparation of this bill.

Some increases made necessary by the developments of the war have been recommended. Among them is an increase for the promotion of our commerce, both foreign and domestic. I am frank to say that personally I would have been willing to see an even greater amount appropriated than is recommended in this bill, for I regard this as a matter of the most vital importance to the prosperity of all the people and particularly at this time. Every dollar that is properly expended for the extension of our foreign commerce at this time will be wisely spent. We are not spending near so much for this purpose as Germany was spending before the war, and we all know that the products of her factories and industries had invaded every country in the world, and that if she had only been content, and had not sought to dominate the world by the force of her arms, she would very soon have become supreme, commercially, over all other nations. This substantial and worth-while peaceful victory would have been secured through the aid which her government was giving to her industries in foreign fields. Neither are we spending as much as Great Britain, which will be our chief, though friendly, trade rival of the future. Nor, I dare say, will we be spending more than Canada, whose statesmen are already planning a world-wide campaign for the exploitation of her products. The nation that does not prepare now for the fierce trade rivalry that is bound to ensue, and that does not take proper and necessary steps to secure a large part of the world's trade, is making a most serious economic mistake.

It is a matter of the most vital importance to every citizen of our country. The greater our trade, the more factories we will have and the greater the number of laborers who will be employed and the better the wages which will be paid them. Likewise, the greater will be the demand for our agricultural products and the price which will be paid for them. If we, as a Nation, expect to keep our place in the sun, then we must see to it that American-made goods and American products of all kinds find their way into all the markets of the world. In the future a nation's greatness very happily will not be measured by the size of its army or the strength of its naval armament, but by its commercial strength. The true test will not consist in the number of its naval vessels and its big guns, but rather in the number of its factories.

The opportunities have never been greater or more inviting than they are at this time. The eyes of the whole world are upon America. Her vast resources have become known to every nation on the globe. Her ability to produce, "to deliver the goods," has been demonstrated to a wondering world, and no one will be heard to question her ability to successfully cross swords with every rival in the forceful struggle for a large share of the world's trade. If this is to be secured, then proper steps must be taken now. We must not wait until other nations have satisfied the waiting markets made hungry by the war and thus established a trade which may prove permanent. The devastated regions of Europe offer an inviting field for our products. The same may be said of the neutral countries of Europe whose stock of supplies has run low. Germany, by reason of the activity of commercial agents and her manufacturers, had a great trade with South America and the Orient. The fortunes of war have lost this to her. Shall we permit this trade to be taken by other countries, or shall we reach out and take it as we can do by reason of our vast and varied resources, which are superior to those of any other nation on the globe? To do this we must adopt the plan that Germany followed with such great commercial and financial success, and which other nations are planning to follow, and send experienced and competent commercial agents into promising foreign fields, not to act as sales agents, but to study foreign market conditions and requirements, and to give advice and information to our manufacturers as to how they can best meet such conditions and compete with other countries. We are spending millions of dollars in building the largest merchant marine in the world. These bottoms, filled with American commodities, agricultural and industrial, should enter every market of the world, bringing back in return those elements of wealth which will contribute to the prosperity of our entire citizenship. I regard it as a sad commentary that we are to-day spending for this purpose less than one-twentieth of what it costs to build one first-class battle cruiser.

And let me say just here, Mr. Chairman, that every section of our country is equally interested in this vital problem. It is America's opportunity, and not that of any particular section of America. The enrichment of one section adds to the wealth and commercial strength of our common country. The fires of sectional hatred which years ago unfortunately, but somewhat naturally, mounted high, I am happy to believe have been completely extinguished. There is no North, no South, no East, no West in this country except in a geographic sense. And I greatly deplore the fact that there were some in the recent election who for purely political purposes sought to fan the old fires of sectional hatred into flame by the cry that the "South is in the saddle." Such a sentiment was unworthy of the great political party in whose interest it was uttered, and an insult to those to whom it was addressed, in the hope of influencing them. Let me tell you that there is no such feeling in the South. We rejoice that we are an important part of this great Nation and that our brave boys fought by the side of the brave boys of other sections for the glory and honor of our flag. I repeat that an effort to provoke sectional feeling for political purposes is unworthy of the one who attempts it, and I feel sure will be rebuked by the sober, sensible people of all sections of our country.

And let me say, in no spirit of resentment or criticism, that the South has done much to add to the wealth of the North and East. For reasons with which we are familiar she has had comparatively few manufactories. Her cotton has in large part been shipped hundreds of miles to New England, and there woven into cloth and then distributed over the world. That this has been a serious economic mistake on the part of capital no one will deny, for the South is nearer to South America and the markets of Australia and the Orient. The loss on account of unnecessary transportation is therefore considerable, especially when it is considered that many southern harbors offer ample facilities to steamship lines for the shipment of her valuable products direct to foreign markets. We have the coal, the iron, the water power, the transportation, and other facilities, and with these advantages you may rest assured that factories will soon spring up in the South in greater abundance than ever, and that the increasing whir of her spindles and factory wheels will make her an ever-growing commercial as well as agricultural factor in the life and wealth of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I append herewith the memoranda to which I have referred.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, January 6, 1919.

MEMORANDUM.

Re Connection of John J. King with the investigation section of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

In June, 1918, the Hooper-Holmes Bureau, a corporation operating under the laws of New York and engaged in furnishing information and inspection service to insurance companies for the past 25 years, received a telegram from C. F. Nesbit, Commissioner Bureau of War Risk Insurance, asking that one of the principals come to Washington for a conference. In pursuance to the request contained in this telegram I came to Washington and had a conference with Mr. Nesbit, Assistant Secretary Love, and others. I remained here four days. I feel that I was practically drafted into the service of the Government, for the reason that upon my first interview with the commissioner he stated that he wanted me to come here for six months to assist in the organization of a central investigation section to replace the work that had already been planned for numerous branch offices and which had already proven unsatisfactory and very expensive. As a result of my conferences during my first visit to Washington, and after a consultation with my business associates in New York, it was agreed that I would come to Washington in an advisory capacity for three days or thereabouts each week, I having stated it was impossible at that time to give the Government my entire time for six months. Early in July I received an appointment as expert adviser to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. About this time Mr. H. A. Behrens, of Chicago, was also called in as an adviser, and was jointly submitted a plan of operation of the investigation section, centralized in Washington, which plan was adopted and approved by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and the commissioner. This plan has been carried out under my advice and is now functioning. It has been inspected by most of the officials and advisers of the War Risk Bureau and has had their approval. I am attaching hereto a copy of the report outlining the plan.

Mr. Eugene T. Lies, who had been deputy commissioner at the time I first came to Washington, resigned as of July 31, 1918, leaving the position of deputy commissioner, in charge of the investigating section, vacant. During the summer and fall of 1918 this position was frequently offered to me, and I was urged to accept it. I declined to do so, on the ground that I did not feel able to give any more time to the service of the Government, and felt that I was doing all I could do in this advisory capacity. In the fall—to be specific, on November 6, 1918—I agreed to accept the position of deputy commissioner, in charge of the investigation section, on the distinct understanding that it would be for a short time only. My moving motive in accepting the appointment as deputy commissioner was the thought that I should at least for a time accept the responsibility for the organization, and the further feeling of pride in the organization which had been created. It had always been my intention to separate myself from the organization with the end of the year 1918, and the signing of the armistice accentuated this feeling. As the end of the year approached the new director was appointed, and I felt it my duty to remain in the organization until such time as he had had an opportunity to select my successor. Director Lindsley was informed soon after his being inducted into the office that I was one of the war workers who would remain but a short time, and I personally gave him this information at a later date.

The act of Congress creating the Bureau of War Risk Insurance provides that certain investigations and reinvestigations shall be made by the commissioner. The plan under which these investigations have been made is precisely the plan which has been used for more than 30 years by the life and casualty insurance companies, great and small. It is not an experiment nor is it original with me. It provides for reports in the main to be made by local field examiners, whose work is supervised by salaried field examiners, the latter, in addition to this work of supervising, to handle the more difficult class of investigations. The economy of this plan can not be questioned nor can its results. The section has handled a very large number of investigations at a fraction of the cost which would have been incurred had we attempted to have all our investigations made by salaried field examiners, even were it possible to organize such a staff.

The charge has been made that the investigation business of the War Risk Insurance Bureau has been turned over to the Hooper-Holmes Bureau. This is a ridiculous statement, and no person with any knowledge of the facts would make it. The immediate problem confronting the investigation section was to obtain a list of local field examiners who had had some experience in making investigations and who would be willing to make such investigations and reports to the section. Insurance companies, inspection agencies, bar associations, State boards of education, and other similar organizations were appealed to to furnish lists in various States. The difficulty was to obtain the names of people who would be willing to make such investigations and names of such persons were sought from every available source. The fee of $1 for making these investigations which was offered by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was not attractive in view of the amount of work entailed to making the investigations. Many people with previous experience in such work refused to make these reports for this fee, although, on the other hand, a considerable number offered to make reports without fee for patriotic motives. The Hooper-Holmes Bureau furnished its list of correspondents for five States at the urgent request of the gentlemen who were then taxed with the duty of perfecting a list of local field examiners. These same gentlemen urged that the Hooper-Holmes Bureau go further and furnish a complete list of its correspondents, but because of the amount of work entailed this was never done. At least one large inspection agency refused to furnish a list of its correspondents, because it did not wish to divulge its trade secret.

As the work of organization progressed and the section's needs at any given point became acute, it was my custom to suggest names of people at various points throughout the country who were asked to make these reports. Many of them accepted the assignment. Many others refused it. The section now has a list of approximately 110,000 persons through the country who have agreed to make these reports. Of these, approximately 60,000 are active. Possibly 1 per cent of these active local field examiners are persons whose names have been taken from the Hooper-Holmes lists. The other 99 per cent were taken from other lists and obtained in various other ways. The Hooper-Holmes, of course, has no interest whatsoever in the work done by these people. It simply furnished from its files names of people who made reports for it, and they were requested to make reports for the War Risk Bureau. I find, however, that at six points throughout the United States local field examiners have been used who are part of the Hooper-Holmes organization. The names of these men were suggested by me while acting in an advisory capacity and when some one was needed in their respective localities to handle the work. These men have, I am informed, handled the Bureau of War Risk inspections just as they would inspections which come to them from any insurance company, and should there be any profit in the handling of the business, that profit would accrue to the Hooper-Holmes Bureau. Likewise, should there be a loss in handling it, they would sustain the loss. Anyone familiar with the subject knows that there is no profit in handling these reports at $1, and no inspection organization would undertake the work as a purely business proposition.

I have carefully refrained from having any business dealings with the Hooper-Holmes Bureau on behalf of the War Risk Bureau, Investigation Division, since I have been deputy commissioner, and there is much evidence in my files to substantiate this statement.

Mr. W. B. Efner, whose name was mentioned in the article read on the floor of the House by Congressman MANN, is taxed with method and personnel in this organization. Mr. D. A. Jones is superintendent of the Investigation Division. Neither of them has ever had any connection with the Hooper-Holmes Bureau. Our method of handling the payment of fees is such as to provide every possible safeguard for the Government, and I particularly desire that our entire plan be looked into carefully.

JOHN J. KING.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, January 8, 1919.

MEMORANDUM.

Re Connection of D. A. Jones with the Investigation Division of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

In the month of January, 1918, I was offered a position with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance as insurance expert. I accepted this offer and reported for duty on February 11, 1918. I was at that time assigned to the Allotment and Allowance Division of the bureau and my connection with the bureau from February 11 to March 25 was in connection with the Allotment and Allowance Division. On many occasions during this time I conferred with the commissioner and the general counsel of the bureau with reference to making investigations. On the 25th of March I was assigned to make investigations by the commissioner, Mr. C. F. Nesbit. On April 1 the Investigation Division of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was created. On April 5 I was assigned to this division as secretary or clerk to the head of the division. At that time no deputy commissioner was in charge, but on or about May 1 Mr. Eugene T. Lies was appointed deputy commissioner in charge of investigations and I remained during his connection with the bureau as administrative secretary of the Investigation Division.

The plan promulgated by the deputy commissioner, Mr. Lies, proved to be very expensive to the Government and other plans were discussed. Early in July the plan for investigation under which we are now operating was submitted and approved by the officials. The plan under which the investigations are being made, I understand, is the same plan used by many of the life and casualty companies and inspection companies; that is, the larger number of examinations are made by the local examiners, whose work is supervised or looked after by salaried field examiners, who, in addition, handle the more difficult classes of investigations.

On September 11 I was appointed superintendent of the Investigation Division by the commissioner, Mr. Nesbit, and at this time I am holding the same place. At that time the problem which confronted the Investigation Division was to obtain lists of local examiners who had had some experience in making investigations and who would be willing to make such reports at $1 per report. Many organizations, such as the Bar Association, inspection agencies, insurance companies, and other organizations were appealed to to furnish lists in various States, which was done; but the difficulty we had was to obtain the names of people who would be willing to make such investigations at this nominal fee.

The names of such persons were sought from every available source. The fee of $1 which was offered by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, as anyone knows, was not and is not attractive in view of the amount of work to be done in making such investigations. Many people with previous experience refused to make such inspections. I will state that a considerable number offered to make reports without the fee for patriotic motives, and we have had many reports from them not accepting the fee of $1. I recall that we requested one large inspection agency to furnish a list of its correspondents and it refused, because it did not wish to divulge its lists of correspondents.

There are, approximately, about 110,000 persons throughout the country who have agreed to make reports for the bureau; of these about 60,000 are active, and not more than 1 per cent are persons whose names have been furnished from the Hooper-Holmes list; the others were taken from other lists and obtained in various ways. Our method of handling the payment of these fees is such that it provides every possible safeguard for the Government.

On January 2, 1919, there appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter read by Mr. MANN, a Member of Congress, on the floor of the House of Representatives, in which I was branded as a member of the "clique who expected to get rich from the investigation section of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance," which statement also implied that I, as an employee of the Government and superintendent of the Investigation Division of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, was acting in collusion with Mr. King and Mr. Efner in such capacity, Mr. King being also an employee of the Government and vice president of the Hooper-Holmes bureau mentioned, to forward the interests of that company at the expense of the Government and in utter disregard of my duty as a Government employee. I will state that I never knew the Hooper-Holmes bureau or Mr. King, nor have I had any communication or connection with him or the Hooper-Holmes bureau prior to the time Mr. King became connected with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Investigation Division. The statement is not true that the investigations of Bureau of War Risk Insurance matters have been turned over to the Hooper-Holmes bureau. The work is being carried on through our own organization. We have handled 253,145 investigations, and of this number we have placed 7,358 with local examiners in six cities—whom I am now informed are the managers in their respective cities of the Hooper-Holmes bureau—and their reports are among the best received by us. It was and still is difficult to obtain men to handle this work properly in large cities.

As an employee of the Government and as superintendent of the Investigation Division of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance as above stated, I positively state that the charges contained in the letter referred to, in so far as they relate to me, are absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

D. A. JONES.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a minute right here.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman one minute, but I am yielding it out of my own time.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I would like to know what business it could possibly be of anyone in this bureau, even if the Government was going to pay the allowance to these mothers throughout the country, if a mother has a boy in the Army and he is making his mother an allotment of one-half of his pay, whether that mother is a moral woman or a good woman. She has furnished a boy to the Army, and this boy has given $15 of his pay. If she has given this boy to the service of his country, why is not she entitled to receive $10 allowance per month from the Government? Anyhow, why should they leave it to my judgment or the opinion of anyone as to whether the mother is moral or immoral? When they refer this case to me, am I to pass upon the morality of this woman? Should any person be clothed with the power to pass judgment upon the character of mothers with sons who are in France? Is it to be left to the judgment of anyone whether these women have at all times lived the proper kind of life or not? I think it is an outrage, I think it is a disgrace, that when our boys are fighting in France for the Government to send emissaries over this country attempting to connect the name of the mother with some scandal. I charge that in every such instance this bureau has been engaged in an attempt to prove the mothers of these boys in France immoral women [applause], with the hope of escaping payment of a paltry allowance. [Applause.]

This is the crowning infamy of a department of this Government that has proven itself infamous in the extreme. This wholly inefficient branch of the War Department has by its inefficiency and reckless disregard of the law caused countless thousands of dependents of our brave boys to suffer because of a lack of the necessaries of life.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Nineteen minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, there is a feature of this legislation to which I wish to invite the attention of the House in the two minutes I have. I wish to refer to the way the committees are assigned their duties. It is clear to me that much of the work of these committees can be assigned, even under the rules, to other committees in such a way that they will all be working committees, and people could not come in here complaining that they are getting a clerk without any reason. I know that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is getting lots of legislation that could, to say the least, go somewhere else. That is true of the Judiciary Committee and others. I am inclined to think that that is true of the Appropriations Committee. It is not the purpose of Congress to make two or three big committees work day and night and never really getting done. It is better if we could have it so that every man in this House might be on a working committee and each committee have something to do all the time. And there should be, in my judgment, such a reassignment and redistribution of these bills as to make that possible. Just specifically, I notice now that this bill provides no clerk for the Woman Suffrage Committee. To my personal knowledge there are 11 committees that have clerks here that do not do as much work as the Woman Suffrage Committee. I am on two committees myself neither one of which does as much work as the Woman Suffrage Committee, though both have done a good deal—one much work. Now, I believe you could do much good in this House by having a committee to reexamine the rules and their application to these committees so as to assign the bills in such a way as to make every committee a working committee. If it is not going to be a working committee it might just as well be disposed of; and if it is going to be a working committee it ought to have a clerk, and it ought to be allowed to do something and compelled to do something.

The larger the number of Members who take an active part in shaping legislation the better the Congress. I know of many bills sent to what are known as the big committees which, under the rules reasonably interpreted, could be sent to committees which are not doing one-third the work they could just as well do. Yet we see these big committees actually clamoring for possession of bills over which they have, under the rules, absolutely no jurisdiction whatever. As far as the rules allow, this legislation should be distributed so that all committees would have something to do. This would give the big committees better opportunity to do thorough work. All proffered legislation would then come on the floor in better shape. Every man would then have a chance to do active personal work. As it is, some men crowd others off the floor all the time. This Congress is intended to be a representative body, representative of all the people. What is the use of having 435 Members if 30 or 40 of them on a few committees have charge of the preparation of all important legislation and there is no sense for such a theory? In my judgment, there ought to be a committee in this House to plan a better distribution of the bills introduced. The Committee on Rules perhaps ought to frame a different rule governing that proposition. Possibly the Speaker could get time, with the assistance of a small committee, to consider every bill introduced and determine where it should go. Certainly something should be done to put the burdens on more shoulders to relieve the overworked committees and to establish an equality of work and a balance of power among the committees of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion in regard to the shortcomings of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. After the act of November, 1917, got into operation I started out perhaps with as many war-risk cases as anybody in the House. West Point is in my district, and the war-risk insurance act particularly benefits the old sergeants and old enlisted men in the Regular Army, who had been and generally have continued living with their families at the old Army posts. With them it came as an increase of pay, practically. They were living on the old Army pay, which the war nearly doubled, and they started in and assigned half of their pay to their wives, and the War Risk Bureau added the family allowance, in many cases after a most exasperating delay.

As a matter of fact 150 cases came down here from West Point alone, and the War Risk Insurance Bureau proceeded to lose the papers of 50 of those cases. [Laughter.] Fortunately they had all been made out in duplicate and made out in the proper form at the quartermaster's office at the academy. The duplicates were sent down, and the War Risk Insurance Bureau promptly proceeded to lose 25 of those. [Laughter.] It took my secretary and myself several months to get them all straightened out, although they were perfectly simple cases, and there was really no question about them. In one of these cases my secretary finally followed the papers from one section of the bureau to another until he saw the check made out at the disbursing office and put it in the mail.

The real trouble about the administration of the war-risk-insurance business, however, chiefly is the law itself. This Congress had no business to pass such an act as that. The bill was concocted in secret sessions by Judge Mack and a coterie of highbrows, whose attitude was that they knew everything and that Members of Congress are a bunch of boobs, who know nothing. They pulled Mr. Gompers in and railroaded the bill through under the guise of a labor measure. Judge Mack sat up there in the gallery and sent down notes to Mr. RAYBURN and members of the committee which had the bill in charge, practically commanding them that they should not allow such and such amendments to go through.

That act was designed with Mack-iavellian ingenunity to produce confusion and distress. Allotments of soldiers' and sailors' pay are nothing new and neither is there anything new about compensation, except the name.

Allotments have been handled for years by the Quartermaster's Department of the Army and the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts in the Navy, and they could have kept on handling them without any serious trouble; and if family allowances were to be added these two bureaus of the War and Navy Departments could easily have been expanded to take care of them. In fact they did keep on handling some of the allotments without family allowances, and finally had to take them all over to help out the War Risk Bureau, though the taking over was the cause of much additional and unnecessary confusion and some distress.

The compensation or pensions should certainly have been given to the Pension Bureau, and nothing but unwarranted Democratic prejudice against the old soldiers and the Pension Bureau itself prevented that from being done. The insurance feature probably should have been given to the Pension Bureau also, but if given to the War Risk Bureau it was the only thing that should have been put on that little bit of a 2 per cent bureau that was organized originally simply to insure ships. Why you should have put the enormous business of allotments and compensation and insurance on a little bureau in the Treasury Department created simply to insure ships was a mystery to me. The bureau was bound to break down under the load. No power on earth and no amount of "efficiency" in management could have saved it. Congress ought to have had sense enough to throw that bill out and pass a bill that was properly drawn. I believe at the time I was the only Member on this side of the House who voted against the passage of that bill. [Applause.] Now there seem to be a lot of Members who wish they had also so voted.

Mr. STAFFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish in any way to supplement the exhaustive presentation of this measure made by the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee], but I wish to make a few general observations.

It has been suggested that four years after the conclusion of the present war the cost for maintaining our Government would be in the neighborhood of from $4,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 annually. At the beginning of the war the cost was in the neighborhood, as you all know, of $1,000,000,000. We have in the bill presented to you—the first appropriation bill after the signing of the armistice—which reflects, in a way, the war activities of the Government and the expectation of larger increases of appropriation occasioned by our entrance into the war.

This bill carries a total appropriation of $96,000,000. The last legislative appropriation bill carried $37,000,000. The $96,000,000 must be credited with $13,000,000 provided for the taking of the census. Fifteen million dollars is the amount carried, but we usually appropriate $2,000,000 for that bureau. But outside of that instance I do not recall any increase that is not directly traceable to the war. For instance, the appropriation for the State Department: In 1917 we appropriated on the statutory roll $321,000 and $126,000 additional for temporary employees, or a total of $447,000. This bill, for statutory employees in the State Department, carries a total of $529,000 and $125,000 additional for temporary employees, or a total of $654,000.

However, you may take other items in this bill—for instance, the appropriation for the Comptroller of the Treasury: For the fiscal year 1917 we appropriated $73,000, and this bill carries $157,000. Take the Treasurer's office: In 1917, $325,000; in this bill, $778,000. Take Internal Revenue: For the clerical force in that bureau, $381,000 for the fiscal year 1919, and for the coming fiscal year, $687,000. That is not the amount that we appropriate for services in the field for collecting the revenue, which aggregates the large amount of $21,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. This is only for this city?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. That is only for the clerks in the bureau here in Washington. So that we have here incontrovertible testimony that by reason of our entrance into the war the expenses of the Government are going to be at least twofold, and maybe threefold, as the immediate necessities follow.

The subcommittee has had great difficulty in readjusting the clerical force of the War Department and the Navy Department to the conditions that will obtain during the next fiscal year. As was stated by the chairman of the subcommittee, the Navy Department has resorted to naval reservists in large numbers to perform clerical services, and it was represented by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Roosevelt, when called before our committee, that it was the policy and intention of the Navy Department to go before the Committee on Naval Affairs and ask for authorization to provide for 2,500 reservists during the next fiscal year.

I agree with the chairman of the subcommittee that that practice is open to criticism. Though the War Department used limited-service men in a clerical capacity, it is not the intention of the War Department during the next fiscal year to use limited-service men at all, but to dismiss as rapidly as possible during the remaining months of the present fiscal year these limited-service men who have been performing clerical services.

Mr. TILSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to submit to a brief interruption.

Mr. TILSON. Did it appear before the gentleman's committee what is the relative cost of a reservist and a civilian employee to do the same work?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am able to give the gentleman that information. There are three classes of reservists. A chief yeoman or yeowoman receives $1,600, a first-class yeoman $1,344, a second-class yeoman $1,296, a third-class yeoman $1,244, and a landsman $1,123, all salaries higher than are usually paid for clerical services of this character.

I recognize that there was need for the Navy Department to call to the service all who could perform clerical work; but now that the war is over I can not agree with the department, particularly as we are providing for conditions beginning July 1 next, that there is any need for retaining in the Navy Department persons garbed as yeomen or yeowomen, right beside others dressed in civilian clothes, when we can get adequate numbers of clerks right here in the District of Columbia who are only too desirous of being transferred from other departments of the Government. Instance after instance has been called to our attention of young ladies who came to Washington to do their patriotic duty in aid of the Government by performing clerical duties who are now receiving $1,200 or $1,400, who are only too willing to accept service at $1,000 a year, for whom positions are not available, and yet the Navy Department is going to continue, or is asking authorization to continue, this large number, 2,572 reservists, during the coming fiscal year. Naturally we had to proceed with that as a basis in our report of appropriations; but we did provide for temporary employees distributed over various bureaus, segregating the amounts, a total of $1,040,000.

Mr. TILSON. Then the gentleman's very full answer, if stated in condensed form, would be that it costs more for the reservists than it would for civilian employees—that we are paying reservists very much more, on an average, than we pay the civilian clerks alongside of them?

Mr. STAFFORD. We are not paying so very much more, but we are paying them more; but it is a censurable practice to retain in a civilian capacity, when the war is over, persons under naval classification to perform clerical work, and there is no reason whatsoever why the Navy Department should ask it when there are adequate clerks in the District who are only too willing to perform that work, and, furthermore, when the committee were willing to grant them the money if they would only make the request.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman know whether they are privileged to make allotments and the Government makes allowances to their families in addition to their pay?

Mr. STAFFORD. Although there is no direct testimony on that score, in my opinion this amount does not include their allowances. If they occupy a military position, either with the Navy or War Department, though they may be performing only clerical service, just like the limited-service men, they would be entitled to allowances to their families just like men in the ranks.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I think the gentleman is in error. I think the amount includes allotments for subsistence and also for quarters.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the question the gentleman from Connecticut asked me.

Mr. TILSON. I referred to the allowances to their families.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not make the statement that the gentleman from Idaho seeks to put in my mouth. The gentleman from Connecticut asked me whether this included allowances to families under the war-risk insurance law. I say that they are entitled to the allowances. As far as clothing and subsistence and quarters are concerned, the testimony before the committee confirms the statement made by the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They would be entitled to the allowances allowed them by law.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I have been informed that a great many of the young women were encouraged by the War Department to enlist in this service for three years at these fixed salaries. Now, does the gentleman know whether any of these young women are in this class? If they are, I would not think the department ought to dismiss them when it encouraged them to enlist for three years.

Mr. STAFFORD. That phase of the subject was not gone into whatsoever. As every Member knows, this bill of 150 pages is the most detailed appropriation bill that is presented to the House for consideration. It carries special provision for 19,431 statutory clerks. It has been a laborious work to sit and go over these respective items seriatim, which the committee has been engaged on since two weeks before the regular convening of this session, until a week ago. But there are some features of this bill that take us out of the realm of tedium into the realm of practical affairs, and one of these is the growing importance, by reason of the termination of the war, of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Department of Commerce. We all recognize the great necessity at the present time of developing, so far as opportunity is offered, the European, Asiatic, and other foreign fields for our foreign commerce. We have in times past made provision for commercial attachés and commercial agents for that character of work throughout the world, carrying a total in the bill for the present year of $400,000. The committee, recognizing the need of additional force to develop this work, which is so necessary at the present time, increased one appropriation for this field investigation from $125,000 to $325,000 and increased the total appropriation to $690,000.

There is no denying that if we are going to increase our commerce, if we are going to provide commerce for our merchant marine that is fast being launched, it is absolutely necessary for us to aid as far as we can the manufacturers of this country to gain foreign markets.

The State Department has performed some activities along this line through the Consular Service, but the service performed by the commercial agents and the commercial attachés is separate and distinct and independent of the work performed by the consular representatives connected with the State Department. These men travel throughout the foreign countries to determine what business is available for the manufacturing and industrial interests of this country, and the department is equipped to convey that information directly to the various commercial and industrial activities of the country. I believe that the House will be almost unanimous, if not entirely, in approving this large increase of appropriation.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. How many agents is it supposed to have?

Mr. STAFFORD. We increased one appropriation from $125,000 to $325,000, an increase of $200,000. The salaries of these agents vary from $4,000 to $6,000, plus their per diem expenses when away from headquarters.

Mr. SNOOK. Are they civil-service employees?

Mr. STAFFORD. They are not, as I recall, but my recollection is not distinct in respect to that. I remember that that question was considered some six or eight years ago. They are not civil-service employees, but they have to stand a test which is given them by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in order to have them qualify for the service.

This appropriation should have the cordial support of the manufacturing and commercial interests of the country. Through these agencies the prospects for trade expansion in foreign countries are brought home to our own tradespeople. Other foreign countries have similar trade agents. Should we now neglect this work, when the trade of foreign countries has been paralyzed largely by the war, we will pass by an opportunity that may never be so promisingly ours for years to come.

It is our duty to the industries of the country, it is our duty to our expanding merchant marine, it is of present moment to every section of the country that this commercial governmental aid should be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. STAFFORD and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 99.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is present, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For assistance to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, as follows: Thirty clerks, at $2,000 each; 30 assistant clerks, at $1,200 each; 30 messengers, at $1,200 each; in all, $132,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so at this time to call the attention of the House to the fact that over on the other side of the Capitol every Member who is not a chairman of a committee, and who otherwise has plenty of help by reason of that fact, has $4,400 a year to pay for his clerical help, and their work is not any more than ours. Since this war has come and the demobilization has brought down upon us an enormous correspondence, it is physically impossible for the clerks who can be hired for $2,000 a year to attend to the business of the average Member of this House. While I do not propose to urge any point against the allowance for clerk hire for the Members of the Senate, I think it is only fair that we should at this time appropriate enough money under the proper item to pay the necessary clerical help for the Members of this House. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

For driving, maintenance, and operation of an automobile for the Vice President, $2,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do this for the purpose of correcting the statement which I just made. I made the statement that each Senator not a chairman of a committee was allowed $4,400 a year to pay for clerical help. The chairman of the subcommittee informs me that more than that amount is allowed. How much are they actually allowed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I stated to the gentleman that each Senator now has a clerk who is paid out of the contingent fund, who receives $1,200 a year. That would make $5,600 a year.

Mr. CALDWELL. Well, $5,600 instead of $4,400.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the provision made by the Senate for these Senators who are not chairmen of committees, they are allowed one clerk at $2,000, one assistant clerk at $1,200, and in addition to that they have a messenger at $1,200, so that the total clerical assistance is $3,200.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then the chairman says that there is one other clerk to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My reference was simply to the passage of a Senate resolution which provided for an additional clerk for each Senator, and that clerk was being paid out of the contingent fund. Just whether that is being done now I do not know.

Mr. STAFFORD. The chairman of the committee does not mean to convey the impression to the Members of the House that every Senator who is not a chairman of a committee is entitled to more than one clerk and one assistant clerk and one messenger, as provided in the last item on page 9?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is all they are entitled to under the law as passed by both Houses of Congress, but the Senate passed a resolution which provided for an additional clerk for each Senator, to be paid at the rate of $1,200 per annum, the money to come out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Now, whether they still have that clerk I do not know, but such a resolution was passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was the gentleman referring to the resolution passed by the Senate providing for those cases where the Senator had not been reelected and it was desired to continue the clerical force of the defeated Senator until the next regular or special session of the Congress?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. The Senate has $50,000 in their contingent fund, and that has been all they have had for their miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, certainly for the past four or five years. Now, under the current law the Senate raised their contingent fund from $50,000 to $140,000, the $90,000, or most of it, to be for the payment of the additional fourth clerk for the Senators at the rate of $1,200 a year. That is what I mean.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reading this provision it merely provides those Senators who are not chairmen of committees with two clerks and one messenger.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the fourth clerk, when there are only two clerks?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true, and the gentleman is clearly correct as far as the law is concerned; but I have just stated to the gentleman that at the last session of Congress the Senate passed a Senate resolution—not a joint or a concurrent resolution, but a Senate resolution—providing for an additional clerk for each Senator, to be paid at the rate of $1,200 a year, and increased the contingent fund from $50,000 to $140,000 in order to take care of that extra clerk.

Mr. STAFFORD. Assuming that is the case, that would merely provide for three clerks instead of four.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; it provides for four—three clerks and a messenger—making, in all, $5,600.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman including the messenger as a clerk?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, he is used as a clerk. They do not have any messengers over there who is exclusively so used. I do not know of any Senator who is employing a man simply as a messenger at $1,200. They are used to perform some kind of clerical service.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not acquainted with senatorial ways and I was seeking information.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman where is the provision for the Senate contingent fund to be large enough to take care of another clerk—where in this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is on page 10, line 25. The gentleman will notice the House has put it back to $50,000. I was speaking of the appropriation for the current year, which is $140,000. Now, what the Senate will do when this bill goes over there I do not know—whether they will increase it to $140,000 or leave it at $50,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If they shall increase it to $140,000 for the contingent fund of the Senate, the House conferees will yield and agree to it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They did so before; that has been the uniform practice in regard to appropriations relating exclusively to the organization of either House.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MAPES. Was not the resolution to which the gentleman refers passed before this appropriation was made? If the gentleman will recall, some time in the last session Senator JONES of Washington, I think it was, made a campaign for an extra clerk for those Members of the Senate who were not chairmen of committees, and a resolution was then passed awaiting legislation of this kind which gave each Senator two clerks and a messenger. Is that resolution in force or will it be after this provision is enacted into law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I do not know, and I can not tell the gentleman whether it expired by limitation or not, but I do know a resolution providing for a fourth employee was passed and that $40,000 of the $140,000 was made immediately available covering the expenses of this additional employee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if the proposed commission to equalize, readjust, and reclassify salaries in the executive departments also embraces authority to equalize and readjust salaries of employees of the Senate and the House?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; it does not.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the gentleman think that question ought to be also considered in connection with the reclassification or investigation along the line of the readjustment of salaries in the executive departments?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hardly think so, because each House can take that up for itself, and with very little trouble adjust those salaries at any time it chooses. We have a Committee on Accounts, for instance, that considers resolutions in reference to salaries of employees of the House, and the Senate has a similar committee. There is no reason for a joint commission to pass on such questions.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, 35 or 40 years ago the two Houses of Congress got into a controversy in reference to the readjustment of the salaries of their employees. The House attempted to reduce the salaries of the Senate employees along with the reduction of the salaries of the House employees. The Senate opposed the proposition, and when the bill finally passed both Houses of Congress there was discrimination, the old salaries of the Senate remaining and the new or reduced salaries of the House remaining in the bill as it passed the House originally. Those inequalities have stood now for almost half a century. Men at this end of the Capitol—faithful and efficient employees of the House—doing precisely the same character of work that corresponding officers of the Senate are doing, are receiving from $250 a year to $1,000 a year less. This bill carries appropriations for messengers in the Senate who are paid $220 a year more than we are paying for assistant clerks to committees of the House.

The rate of pay or compensation in the Senate is not excessive or high. It is the same as it was 40 years ago, and yet during that period there has been an advance in the cost of living, especially in the city of Washington. And if we are going in this bill to do justice by the employees of every executive department of this Government, why can we not go a step further and right this inequality which has stood for many, many years? If we continue to leave that responsibility upon the Committee on Accounts another 40 years will pass without anything being done. I trust that when we reach the paragraph providing for a commission that we will do what is right and just by those who have been associated with us here in rendering faithful and efficient service and no longer permit this injustice to remain, which is a reflection upon our sense of fairness in dealing with these faithful and deserving employees of the House.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I want to ask the chairman a question. I notice the gentleman in charge of the bill made a remark that the Senate insisted upon some contingent feature here. I have not been here long enough to be entirely familiar with the procedure in a good many matters. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], Does the Committee on Appropriations when the Senate insists do just what they insist upon, or does this report represent an examination of these arrangements for Senate contingent funds and clerks, and the like, by the committee, so that the committee reports that these are necessary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was referring, I will state to the gentleman, to the amendment which the Senate adopted, increasing their contingent fund in the last bill. Of course, in conference the conferees of the respective Houses always endeavor to carry out the wishes of the House they represent.

Mr. LITTLE. There has been no conference yet.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We were referring altogether to the appropriation for the current year and not in this bill. When it comes to a question of the appropriation for the clerical help of either House it has never been the custom for the other House to offer any objection. In other words, each House, it is understood, will be the judge of just what it needs in the way of clerical assistance and supplies.

Mr. LITTLE. In other words, in discussing clerks and contingent funds you are simply satisfied that the Senate feels that those things are necessary for itself. For example——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We have only allowed here for the Senate the appropriations that have been made from year to year. For instance, we have not recommended $140,000 for their contingent fund. We simply recommended the amount that has always been carried. Now, whether the Senate will see fit to increase it or not, I do not know.

Mr. LITTLE. Does that mean that your committee recommends to this House for its approval the passage of these amounts for clerks?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The amounts carried in the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Your committee feels it knows enough about it to direct this House to pass them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely.

Mr. LITTLE. It does not depend entirely, then, upon the say-so of the Senate about it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am frank to say to the gentleman I do not know just how many clerks the Senate needs. I would not want to say that they did need the clerks or did not need them. We must necessarily depend on the Senate to determine that, and they have indicated——

Mr. LITTLE. Have your researches ever determined whether they need any more than we do or not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it that a Senator, who represents an entire State, whereas we represent only portions of a State, needs a greater amount of clerical assistance than a Member of the House.

Mr. LITTLE. It was not my intention particularly to take issue on that. I was looking for the information from your experience. You think probably they do need a little more, then?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Would it appear to you they need twice as much?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That would depend, of course, upon the correspondence of each individual Member and also of the Senators. There might be cases where they do not need twice as much and there might be cases where they needed more.

Mr. LITTLE. I was just seeking the information.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. There are some cases where there are two Senators in a State and one Member of Congress. In that case the Member of Congress would have as much work as both Senators. And there are some States where Senators live in rural sections and Congressmen in thickly settled sections, where the Congressman would have three times as much correspondence. I mean to say that neither of the Senators in my State has the correspondence that I have.

Mr. LITTLE. Do you not think that in a State where they have two Senators and one Representative the Representative should receive the same amount the two Senators receive? Would that suggestion receive the Senate's approval?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call attention to the misspelling of the word "pamphlet," on line 13, page 10. Without objection, it will be corrected.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

For clerk, $3,000; inspector, under section 20 of the act approved January 12, 1895, $2,000; stenographer, $1,000; for expenses of compiling, preparing, and indexing the Congressional Directory, $1,600; in all, $7,600, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, with regard to this item here, I have wondered whether the Joint Committee on Printing could not, by the adoption of some rule or method, make some change in the printing of the roll calls. If the names on roll calls could be printed in distinctive type, that would be valuable not only to the present Congress, but valuable to students and persons who are investigating matters involved in roll calls after this Congress and other Congresses shall have passed away.

For instance, if one wants to know the political line up of parties and how the votes are recorded on a measure, it takes hours, and even days, to go back and look up the history of that vote to learn how the parties were divided. You must take not only the roll call at the beginning of the session, but oftentimes Members die and others are elected in their stead, and you must also take the biographical dictionary and find out to what party Members belong.

It seemed to me that if the names of Members could at all times be printed in distinctive type and that type carried not only through one Congress, but through all Congresses; that is, if the names of the Democratic Members could be differentiated, as now, in roman type, and adopt it as a permanent thing and print the roll calls in the same way, and use italics for the Republican Members, then if persons who come after us or persons unacquainted with the Members wanted to look up the personal history on roll calls they could tell at a glance just how political parties and members of political parties voted on the roll calls.

It seems to me it would not cost a cent more to do it, but it would be of great advantage to anyone taking up the study of legislation in the Congress of the United States. I do not know whether any members of the Joint Committee on Printing are here. I do not know whether it is possible or not to do this; but it seems to me that something of that kind ought to be done.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I wish to state, for the benefit of the gentleman from Iowa and the Members here, that in Illinois the secretary of state carries on a publication in the form of a bluebook, containing a list of members of the House and of the Senate of Illinois, from the beginning of the State legislature, and each year you can get your copy of the bluebook when it is handed to you and there see the political complexion of each member.

Mr. GOOD. What I am talking about is the roll calls as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They are not printed in distinctive type. It seems to me they might be printed in distinctive type, and that it would be a great convenience for people not familiar with the membership of Congress to know just exactly what their political affiliations were.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] strikes me at first blush as a very good suggestion. The tally sheet, from which the roll call in the RECORD is made, is already printed in distinctive type. It has been the case, I think, for years, for the majority Members to be printed in roman and for the minority Members to be printed in italics and for independents to be printed in capital letters or by some other means of distinction, so that if the Government Printing Office would follow copy the distinction would be made in the roll call; that is, follow copy as to the kind of print. We frequently waste a great deal of time—many of us, I think—in going over old roll calls, and sometimes present roll calls, in figuring how Members vote. It is not very difficult as to the present roll calls, because most of us know the political complexion of the Members; but if you want to go back awhile, frequently in looking over an old roll call it is quite a job.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman means it is not difficult for a Member of the House to do it at present?

Mr. MANN. Yes; it is not difficult for a Member of the House to do it at present.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But for an outsider it would be exceedingly difficult?

Mr. MANN. Yes. Of course probably the main reason why there is distinctive type used for the different political parties in the tally sheet is that it is for the benefit of the newspaper boys, so that they will not have to figure out what a man's politics is. It is right before them when they make up the list, and they frequently report how the House votes politically.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am not a printer, but it seems to me it would be very difficult for the printers to print the RECORD in the manner suggested. Probably the same end would be accomplished by having a capital letter, indicating the party to which the Member belongs, placed beside the Member's name.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand why it will be difficult for the Government Printing Office to print one name in Roman and the next in italics.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I presume the RECORD is set up by machinery, by the linotype, and it would not be as easy to insert italics and capital letters as it would be to insert the letter "R" or the letter "D," as the case may be, after the names of Members.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The physical difficulties of printing, of course, might be easily overcome, but I believe that if the gentleman from Illinois will consider the question more thoroughly he will realize that there ought not to be in the official declaration of a vote recognition of political parties, to be put in by name. The physical difficulties could probably be overcome, but the objection is one more fundamental than that. The mere physical difficulty is not in the way. It ought not to be.

Mr. MANN. I could readily see that there might be an objection to having inserted at the end of the vote so many Democrats voted "aye" and so many voted "no" and so many Republicans voted "aye" and so many voted "no." I would not do that; but it is just as convenient for Members of the House and other people to have the roll call printed in such a way as to show the politics as it is at the Clerk's desk, where it is convenient for the clerks to have the tally sheet printed that way, so that they can tell whether a man is a Republican or a Democrat.

In other words, the reading clerk, in calling the roll, when he calls a name printed in roman will look over at that side of the House for a response, and when he calls a name printed in italics he will look over on this side of the House.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A year or two ago did we not provide for a much more elaborate index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than the one we have now—more of a topical index?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD index is very much amplified now.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. We talked a good deal about it. I thought there was provision made, and that ex-Senator Peffer, of Kansas, was engaged on it under some provision that was made.

Mr. MANN. I think that did not apply to the current RECORD.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That applied to the old RECORD, indexing it by topics. When a man talked about free silver in 1896, or greenbacks in 1876, Senator Peffer would find that and index it.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it was mainly to give employment to somebody.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was called to the attention of some committee, I believe, a year ago that there was some person employed by the Senate to do that work, and that he was receiving a large fee for indexing the RECORD. I believe that person has since gone into the service of the Army, and that the RECORD is not being indexed accordingly at the present time.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For compensation of Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates from Territories, the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico, and the Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands, $3,304,500.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to increase the compensation of Representatives and Senators from $7,500 to $10,000 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not indicate where the amendment is to come in.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is the gentlemen's motion to strike out "$3,304,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,400,000"?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. I offer that as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania offers an amendment on page 12, line 5, to strike out the figures "$3,304,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,400,000."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I reserve a point of order on that amendment. I will say to the gentleman that his amendment will not accomplish what he desires, because the law fixes the salaries of Members of Congress at $7,500, and merely to increase the total of the appropriation would not increase the salaries. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chaplain: For Chaplain, $1,200, and $600 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, in line 15, I move to strike out the figures "$600" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$800," so as to increase the salary of the present Chaplain $200.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DYER moves to amend, on page 12, line 15, by striking out the figures "$600" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$800."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I reserve a point of order, if the gentleman wishes to discuss his amendment.

Mr. DYER. I do not think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Suppose I make the point of order and let the gentleman discuss that.

Mr. DYER. I am quite sure it is not subject to a point of order. If the gentleman wants to make it, he may do so.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I make the point of order that it is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks, messengers, and janitors to the following committees: Accounts—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Agriculture—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Appropriations—clerk $4,000 and $1,000 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent, assistant clerk and stenographer $2,500, assistant clerks—1 $1,900, 1 $1,800, janitor $1,000; Banking and Currency—clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Census—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Claims—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Coinage, Weights, and Measures—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; District of Columbia—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress—clerk $2,000; Elections No. 1—clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000; Elections No. 2—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Elections No. 3—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Enrolled Bills—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Flood Control—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Foreign Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Immigration and Naturalization—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Indian Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Industrial Arts and Expositions—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Insular Affairs—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Interstate and Foreign Commerce—clerk $2,500, additional clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Irrigation of Arid Lands—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Invalid Pensions—clerk $2,500, stenographer $2,190, assistant clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000; Judiciary—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,600, janitor $720; Labor—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Library—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Merchant Marine and Fisheries—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Military Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Mines and Mining—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Naval Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Patents—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Pensions—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,600, janitor $720; Post Offices and Post Roads—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,400, janitor $1,000; Printing—clerk

$2,000, janitor $1,000; Public Buildings and Grounds—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Public Lands—clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Revision of the Laws—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Rivers and Harbors—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800; janitor $1,000; Roads—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Rules—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Territories—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; War Claims—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk, $1,200, janitor $720; Ways and Means—clerk $3,000, assistant clerk and stenographer $2,000, assistant clerk $1,900, janitors—1 $1,000, 1 $720; in all, $171,790.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee how it comes that the Foreign Affairs Committee, a very small committee, and the Indian Affairs Committee, another small committee, have assistant clerks at $1,800, while the Naval Affairs Committee and the Post Office Committee and a lot of large committees here have clerks at $1,500 or $1,400? How does that happen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know, unless the chairmen of those committees were a little more persuasive with the House. I will say to the gentleman that practically all of these clerks to committees have been allowed in the first instance by resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. I just wondered how it came, because there is not any comparison in the amount of work that has to be done by the clerks of these committees. Take the Post Office Committee, for example, with appropriations of about $400,000,000 a year, compared with the Indian Affairs Committee with appropriations of $17,000,000 a year, or the Foreign Affairs Committee with appropriations of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 a year, and the Naval Committee with several billion dollars a year lately.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Probably the number of bills introduced and the number of meetings of the committee and hearings on bills before the committee would have more to do with the work of the clerk than the total sum carried in the annual appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think that helps the case any, because some of these big committees are constantly in session.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I doubt if there is a more active committee mentioned by the gentleman, outside of the Committee on Naval Affairs, than the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not disparage the importance of the work of the Indian Affairs Committee, but the volume of its work can not be compared with the volume of the work done by some other committees.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not in dollars and cents, but it does have important work to do.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not say it is not important; but the volume of its work can not amount to so much as that of some of these other committees.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Since I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I understand that has been the case heretofore, the Appropriations Committee has never recommended an additional clerk to a committee unless a resolution providing for it was first introduced and passed by the House. So I can not give the gentleman any information as to why these salaries are different. That is a matter that rests with the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will some gentleman in the Committee on Military Affairs tell us how many clerks that committee has?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, they have a clerk, an assistant clerk, and a messenger, called the janitor.

Mr. MANN. Of course, we carry a clerk and an assistant clerk in this bill, but I am under the impression that Congress has provided an additional clerk for the Committee on Military Affairs in a resolution, whose compensation is payable out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CALDWELL. There are several people working up there. One of them is the chairman's secretary, who is allowed under another provision of the bill, and it may be that there is still another one, because the work is very, very heavy.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure, but I have it in my mind that an additional clerk was provided. Whether that still obtains I do not know. This bill carries one clerk at $2,500 and an assistant clerk at $1,500 and a janitor at $1,000. The Committee on Military Affairs has been probably the most active committee of the House from the beginning of the session to the end, and is likely to be in the next Congress. I do not think we are making proper provision for that committee in this bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have not heard any particular complaint up there. Since I come to think, there are three men and two women working there all of the time. One of them is the clerk, one is the janitor, as he is called, and one is the assistant clerk. Then one is Mr. DENT's secretary, allowed under the provision of the bill on page 19, as every one of us has a secretary allowed, and then there is another one, and I do not know just what her status is.

Mr. MANN. Of course, as suggested by my colleague, Mr. MADDEN, it would be ridiculous for Congress to say that the Committee on Military Affairs should have one assistant clerk at $1,500 and the Committee on Foreign Affairs should have one assistant clerk at $1,800, and I say that with the intention of making no reflection whatever upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MADDEN. Or the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Indian Affairs has a great deal of legislation outside of its appropriation bill. The Committee on Foreign Affairs is one of the important committees of the House, and I am making no reflection upon it at all. I think that committee ought to have an $1,800 assistant clerk.

Mr. CALDWELL. I would not be at all surprised that a large amount of the work that is being done up in the Committee on Military Affairs is being done as it is in a great many of the other Members' rooms, paid for out of the pocket of the Member, instead of out of the Treasury of the United States, as it should be. I have no doubt in the world that the help up there ought to be increased, because the work is very heavy.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, it occurred to me that perhaps they need some one as clerk of the Committee on Foreign Affairs who is acquainted with some other language. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I think the Committee on Foreign Affairs needs no interpreter. The members of that committee speak all languages.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 25, after the figures "$720" insert "Woman Suffrage, clerk, $2,000; assistant, $720."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not authorized by law. It is legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman informed us a few moments ago that they made up this list of clerks after resolutions had been introduced and passed on the floor. The resolution was introduced here this morning and passed with regard to a clerk, and if you follow the rule you laid down a few moments ago, now that that resolution has been adopted, then this bill is subject to the same amendments that you would make to it under your argument. I do not see anything in the point of order. If it is out of order I do not care to waste time discussing it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LITTLE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that every one of these assistants who have been added here is subject to the same point of order, having been added because of resolutions introduced, and they ought to be stricken out.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not rule on such an omnibus point of order as that.

Mr. LITTLE. Then I shall make the point of order a little more definite, though I am not familiar enough with them to indicate which ones; but let us take, for example, the assistant clerk to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I do not know whether that is added by virtue of some resolution such as the gentleman from Tennessee mentioned, but I am going to assume that it is and make the point of order that it is out of order, because it was added, and if the gentleman says it was not, that would cover that point. Each of these assistants here was added because of some resolution like that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I can not speak positively as to every position here, but my impression is that practically all, if not all, of these positions have been provided by resolution.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I renew my point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And even if that were not true, the gentleman's point of order comes too late, because there has been discussion of the paragraph and amendments offered.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I renew my point of order. The chairman says that they are all that way in effect. If mine is out of order they all are.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman's point of order comes too late. The point of order is overruled, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Doorkeeper: Doorkeeper, $5,000; maintenance and repair of folding-room motor truck, $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary; special employee, $1,500; superintendent of reporters' gallery, $1,600; janitor, $1,500; messengers—16 at $1,180 each, 14 on soldiers' roll at $1,200 each; laborers—17 at $720 each, 2 known as cloakroom men at $840 each, 8 known as cloakroom men, 1 $600 and $120 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent, and 7 at $600 each; 2 female attendants in ladies' retiring rooms at $800 each; superintendent of folding room, $2,500; foreman, $1,800; 3 clerks, at $1,600 each; messenger, $1,200; janitor, $720; laborer, $720; 32 folders, at $900 each; 2 drivers, at $840 each; 2 chief pages, at $1,500 each; 2 messengers in charge of telephones (one for the minority), at $1,800 each; 2 assistant chief pages, at $1,500 each; 44 pages, during the session, including 2 riding pages, 2 telephone pages, press-gallery page, and 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each, $23,430; superintendent of document room, $2,900; assistant superintendent, $2,100; clerk, $1,700; assistant clerk $1,600; assistants—seven at $1,280 each, one $1,100; janitor, $920; messenger to press room, $1,000; in all, $161,750.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, in line 9, strike out the words "assistant chief pages" and insert in lieu thereof "assistants to messengers in charge of telephones, one for the minority."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is simply to make the appropriation conform with the resolution which was passed creating those two places.

Mr. LITTLE. May I inquire when this was passed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can tell the gentleman in a few moments.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It was about October.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The resolution was agreed to September 24, 1918, and provided for those places in the language as appears in the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

For the employment of Joel Grayson in document room, $2,150.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. I am desirous to know why this great big mass of gentlemen who are going to draw all this money on all these preceding cases are to be lost in obscurity while our distinguished and mutual friend, Joel Grayson, has to be mentioned by name in lines 18 and 19, where I find, "For the employment of Joel Grayson in document room, $2,150." I have not the slightest doubt that Joel is a good fellow, but I want to know what Joel has done that he is distinctly specified ahead of all mankind.

Mr. MANN. I think I can give the gentleman the information.

Mr. JUUL. I do not do it sarcastically, but simply in order to find out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, Joel Grayson knows more about public documents than any other man on earth. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, that was exactly what I wanted to find out.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is true, and I think the gentleman himself must have known that. Here is the reason why his name is in here; I am perfectly willing to state it. It got to the point where the Republicans thought the Democrats would shortly win Congress, or, perhaps, after they knew they had won or were going to win, and it was the opinion on both sides of the House that Joel Grayson ought to be retained in the document room as a bureau of information and ought not to be left at the tender mercies of the superintendent of the document room or the doorkeeper, or even any committee that might be appointed to divide out the patronage, and both sides of the House unanimously agreed to put that provision in the bill, specifying him by name, and it was done. It is not subject to the point of order, and I hope he will be kept in the document room as long as he lives. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. His case came up on attempt to discharge him at one time, and it was carried finally to the Comptroller of the Currency some years ago.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what his politics are.

Mr. FOSTER. I think he is a Republican, but he is one of the best men in the Capitol.

A MEMBER. He came from Virginia.

Mr. EAGLE. In reference to the gentleman's comment, I am glad to observe one public official somewhere in America who has at the same time the commendation of even a considerable portion of the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Let me add that this order or this procedure was adopted a great many years ago, not just a few years ago.

Mr. MANN. I remember when it was adopted, though I could not specify the date.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It must have been 20 years ago.

Mr. MANN. No; I do not think it was.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. His name was carried when I first came to Congress, and that has been 16 years ago. His name was carried in this bill.

Mr. MANN. I can not say just how long ago it was.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. My belief is that it has been carried in there for 20 years just because of his superior qualifications and fitness for that place.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield? He has been in long enough, so that he holds his place by right of prescription now?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. He holds it, although he is a Republican, under a Democratic House, has for the past eight years, and will hold it under the next House, not because he is a Republican, but he will hold it when the Republicans organize the House because of his efficiency.

Mr. EAGLE. Is my friend quite sure that if he were a good Democrat he would hold it?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Oh, undoubtedly, because we have good Democrats in the organization who are particularly efficient and who have been held by the Republicans. I know one who held for 16 years when the Republicans were in control.

Mr. JUUL. I just wished to conclude my question. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if this sum of $2,150 would be available for another man performing the same service in case anything should happen to Joel Grayson?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; it would not; it would lapse. The appropriation would lapse and remain in the Treasury, of course, if this man should resign or die.

Mr. JUUL. What would become of the office in the meantime?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It would be necessary for the House to make some provision, but this appropriation would not be available for anyone else.

The Clerk read as follows:

For minority employees authorized and named in the resolution of December 6, 1915: Special employee, $1,800; special messenger and assistant pair clerk, $1,800; two special messengers, at $1,800 each; special chief page and pair clerk, $1,800; in all, $9,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to get the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] if I can. This paragraph provides for minority employees of the House and specifies those named in the resolution of December 6, 1915. Those were Republican minority employees. I am under the impression that in the next House the minority employees are likely to be selected by the Democratic side of the House, but there is no provision in this bill for their selection by the House or by the Democratic side of the House. We have usually carried in the bill an item providing that successors of these employees might be named by the House of Representatives at any time, and if that provision be carried in this bill, then it would authorize the Democratic caucus to have some one move a resolution that certain men be named to these places; but without that provision the places will become vacant unless the Republican minority employees fill them besides filling the majority employees' places.

Now, I do not want to be too magnanimous, but, on the other hand, I never did believe in taking candy from children. [Laughter.] It is that paragraph and the five following it. Heretofore we have carried, where it would come in after line 11, page 18, this language:

Successors to any of the employees provided in the preceding paragraph may be named by the House of Representatives at any time.

Now, why was that left out of the bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was going to say to the gentleman that that provision has always been carried, and it was left out of this bill by the formal vote of the committee. I can not offer any reason for it, and I appreciate the force of what the gentleman says. I shall offer an amendment, when we reach the item, restoring it. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for calling the attention of the committee to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

To continue employment of the laborer authorized and named in the resolution of December 19, 1901, $840.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is the place where the gentleman proposes to offer the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: Page 18, line 11, insert: "Successors to any of the employees provided for in the six preceding paragraphs may be named by the House of Representatives at any time."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the form of the language in the current law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Official reporters: Six official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, at $5,000 each; assistant, $2,500; six expert transcribers, at $1,200 each; janitor, $720; in all, $40,420.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, if I may.

It seems that the Official Reporters of debates of the House are entitled to better consideration than they receive. If there ever was a corps of efficient men, trained in the art of their employment, it is this corps. It seems to me that while everybody who has devoted a lifetime to the study of an important calling, requiring expert knowledge and experience should be given the compensation which that knowledge and experience and their work justify, these men are not being paid what they should be paid. And I am rather at a loss to understand why the Committee on Appropriations has never thought proper to report an increased appropriation for their compensation.

I think the salaries of the official reporters of the House were fixed 30 or 40 years ago, when you could buy potatoes for 25 cents a bushel, sugar for 3 cents a pound, flour for $4 a barrel, beefsteak for about 10 cents a pound, ham for 7 or 8 cents, and bacon for about 5 or 6 cents, while to-day the cost of these commodities has soared so sigh that it is only occasionally that a person can get an opportunity to indulge in the luxury of eating them.

I do not know whether it is in order or not, but I am going to test it out by trying. I move to amend the item for the compensation of the official reporters of the House by increasing that compensation to $6,000 each where it now is reported at $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN moves to amend, page 19, line 4, by striking out "$5,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,000."

Mr. MADDEN. And I move to strike out "$2,500" where it appears and make it "$3,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 5, strike out "$2,500" and insert "3,500."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I am very sorry.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say that I appreciate the force of what the gentleman says; but the Committee on Appropriations has never assumed authority and jurisdiction to bring in an increase of salary for employees of the House without the House having first taken action. I have understood there has been a resolution introduced, or is about to be introduced, in regard to the salaries of the reporters of debates in the House. That resolution will go to the Committee on Accounts, the proper committee for jurisdiction of it, and in that way the House can take such action as it sees fit. Since it is not authorized by law, I feel constrained to make the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I appreciate the modesty of the gentleman from Tennessee and his committee in not having recommended action until the House has first acted; but since the House has had no opportunity to act, why should the committee object to giving it that opportunity now?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My genial friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] says the Committee on Appropriations never does any of these things without the consent of the House, but this very paragraph carries an item that the House has never authorized, namely:

Six expert transcribers, at $1,200 each.

When did the House give authorization for that?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the gentleman's absence from Congress a resolution passed the House which provided that instead of the Official Reporters of debates paying the transcribers out of their own salaries and then being reimbursed later, the transcribers should be made annual clerks at $1,200 a year.

Mr. MANN. All right. I was not aware of that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, did I understand the Chair to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee? I did not understand the ruling. I thought the Chair overruled it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustained it. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, for clerk hire, necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $2,000 per annum, in monthly installments, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be entitled to payment under this appropriation: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House and be subject to be removed at the will of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they are appointed; and any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may appoint one or more clerks, who shall be placed on the roll as the clerk of such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner making such appointments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman please, if the gentleman is going to reserve a point of order on the paragraph, I would have him make it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order. It is legislation not authorized by law.

Mr. CALDWELL. Of course, the gentleman realizes that that knocks out all the clerk hire of all the Members?

Mr. STAFFORD. I intend to do as I did last year—offer an amendment providing for the same amount for clerk hire as is now provided by the present bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. That it is legislation not authorized by existing law.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What is legislation?

Mr. STAFFORD. Two thousand dollars.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Does the gentleman contend that it ought to be $1,200, the law?

Mr. CALDWELL. The law is $1,200. I understand that any Member who is not a chairman of a committee authorized by resolution to have a clerk is entitled to a session clerk at the rate of $100 a month. That is the law, so that if the gentleman from Wisconsin insists on his point of order, nobody in this House will have a secretary or a clerk to take care of his business. I would like to have the Chair rule on the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Has any Member made a point of order on the paragraph?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin insist on his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

On page 19, line 12, insert "Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $2,000 per annum, in monthly installments, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether this provision in his judgment is subject to a point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is, so far as the amount is concerned. The existing law allows the payment of only $1,200. This authorizes the payment of $2,000.

Mr. MANN. This is the same provision that was stricken out, but the point of order made against the bill is made to the provision in reference to the filing of the names of the clerks with the Clerk of the House, I take it?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is so.

Mr. MANN. This is subject to amendment, then, of course?

Mr. STAFFORD. It may be amended by any germane amendment. It increases the amount.

Mr. MANN. It increases the amount, but it possibly could not provide for a stenographer by name?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is perfectly correct.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not the floor, but I will yield.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I understand the gentleman has an amendment pending and so has the floor. Would the gentleman permit an amendment fixing the amount at $3,200, so that in addition to our secretary we would have a stenographer at $1,200?

Mr. STAFFORD. I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi that the subcommittee did not consider any increase of salary whatsoever for clerk hire. We had this matter thrashed out last year when an attempt was made to raise the allowance for clerk hire from $2,000 to $2,400. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], was voted down at that time when the House decided that the clerk hire should be $2,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But the gentleman from Wisconsin realizes, with everybody else, that this work has been very largely increased, perhaps doubled, since then.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I can not agree to that so far as my own office work is concerned.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It has been very materially increased. My own has been doubled. I imagine that everybody's work has been radically increased; so much so that if you have only one clerk I dare say—I have not had the experience, because, being the chairman of a committee, I have more than that—but I do not believe any one clerk could well attend to the stenographic work in the committee and also perform the duties of secretary.

Now, it occurs to me that if we are able to have a secretary at $2,000 he would do the work of the secretary, and then if we had enough to employ a stenographer to do the stenographic work it would certainly enable the Members of the House to perform their duties to their constituents much more efficiently and effectively. I hope the gentleman will not object to increasing the amount, making it $3,200 instead of $2,000. That would answer all practical purposes and it would not be extravagant.

Mr. STAFFORD. This matter should be presented to the Committee on Accounts in the proper way. The committee has not given any consideration to it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The committee has not given consideration to the $2,000 which the gentleman proposes. The gentleman himself proposes to make the amount $2,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the existing law.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. In the last analysis it has to go back to the committee for final action.

I suppose the Committee on Accounts in the last analysis has got to come back to this committee for final action.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I offer the following amendment, on page 13.

Mr. MANN. There is no page 13 to this.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To strike out the words "pay each," in the first line of the amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the words "for clerk hire for each"; and strike out the words "for clerk hire," in the last part of the second line and the first part of the third line, and add the following at the end of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee to the amendment offered by Mr. Stafford: Page 19, line 13, after the word "delegate," strike out the words "pay each" and insert in lieu thereof "for clerk hire for each," and in lines 14 and 15 strike out the words "for clerk hire," and after the word "necessary," at the end of the amendment, insert:

"Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners from and after July 1, 1919, shall be employees of the House of Representatives and shall be paid in the same manner as other employees of the House are paid: Provided further, That each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner may appoint a clerk or clerks, who shall be subject to be removed at the will of the person by whom they are appointed: Provided further, That the amount unexpended at the end of any month shall be carried forward and be available for expenditure in the succeeding month, but shall not be available beyond the end of the fiscal year: Provided further, That Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be entitled, from the date of commencement of their respective terms, to make appointments and removals of clerks under this appropriation: Provided further, That the employment of any clerk or clerks hereunder shall cease upon the death, resignation, removal, or termination of service of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they were appointed."

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order upon the amendment, as there seems to be a conspiracy between the two gentlemen.

Mr. STAFFORD. To show that there is no "conspiracy between the two gentlemen," I make the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that I was very much surprised when the gentleman from Wisconsin made the point of order against this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman had a typewritten proposition ready to take its place.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I had this amendment in my pocket, which I proposed to offer, because I had understood that this question of clerk hire would come up.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing the gentleman. I knew he had the amendment in his pocket.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am firmly of the opinion that the House can not afford to increase its clerk hire unless it puts its clerks on the roll, as I have been contending for many years.

Mr. MANN. I am not opposed to the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The point of order of the gentleman from Wisconsin would simply have this result: Several years ago, I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] made a very earnest effort to put the clerks to Members on the roll. I remember in my first term in Congress he raised that issue, and I heard it fought out here upon the floor of the House and voted with him, and ever since that time I have been doing what I could in my feeble way to have the clerks to Members put upon the roll. Now, failing in his effort, as a matter of compromise there was inserted in the law a provision, not that Members' clerks should be put on the roll and paid directly out of the Treasury but that Members of Congress should file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives the names of their clerks, which amounted to nothing, except that clerks to Members had their names filed in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives. Now, for what reason I do not know—but certainly I do not criticize him for it—the gentleman from Wisconsin has made a point of order which absolutely destroys that provision, and the result is that there will be no filing anywhere.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am employing an extra clerk who is employed in one of the departments of the Government. Would this provision interfere with my employing that clerk and his being carried on two rolls?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It would if he received over $2,000. I will say that to the gentleman frankly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He would be getting over $2,000 in the aggregate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I think this would interfere with his employment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He is a very competent clerk, and I want him. He can do my work. He reaches my office after the departments close, and he works probably until midnight.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, and I say it in all sincerity and frankness and earnestness, I do not think this House can afford to stand in the position here of absolutely destroying the provision that requires the names of our clerks to be filed in the office of the Clerk of the House and then refuse to place our clerks upon the roll. [Applause.] And I for one am not going to stand before the country as being willing to agree to any such action. Of course, the House can take such action as it pleases.

Mr. MADDEN. I think every clerk ought to go on the roll and be paid by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think our clerks ought to be placed on the roll and be paid by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is what would be done if my amendment should be adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think it ought to be adopted, in fairness to the Members of the House and in fairness to every Member of the next Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If the gentleman's amendment be adopted, would the gentleman object to increasing it to $3,200? Certainly we need it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I am one of those who need more clerk hire than we have got, because I have had occasion to employ and have now employed two clerks, paying one of them out of my own pocket, though I hesitate to refer to myself. I have been doing that ever since I have been in Congress. I am not prepared to say to the gentleman, however, that I would support a proposition to increase the amount of clerk hire, even if my amendment should be adopted.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman, if he thinks we need it, will not be very aggressive in his opposition, I take it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I certainly do not believe the gentleman from Mississippi would support a proposition to increase the $2,000 amount without putting them on the roll.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I, therefore, ask the gentleman if he favors my amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I am in favor of putting them on the rolls absolutely. What I would prefer to do would be to have two clerks, one at $2,000 a year and one at $1,200, both of them on the rolls, but what I ask the gentleman now is, if we accept his amendment, if his amendment is agreed to, would he not be willing to increase the amount to $3,200? They would go on the roll then.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think clearly the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is subject to the point of order. I hope, however, that the House will meet the problem that is before it in a broad-minded way. For years complaint has been made in the House because of the large appropriations made for clerk hire in the other body and the small allowance in the House, and when this matter comes before the House with regard to our own clerk hire we sidestep it. That is not the way to decide this question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has stated that he thinks the amendment I offer is subject to the point of order. Just why?

Mr. GOOD. I think it is clearly legislation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Why, it is germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and that is subject to the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. I do not think it is germane at all, but I would like to see if we can not arrive at some definite agreement in respect to this matter, for the amendment has real merit.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not only germane, but, as some one suggests, it is a limitation providing how that money shall be expended and how it shall be paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. GOOD. It does more than that; and I will say to the gentleman that I do not object to it in the least. I think that the employees of Members, where the salaries are paid out of the Treasury of the United States, should have their names on the rolls and they should be paid directly, providing that provision is made for enough help. I call the gentleman's attention to a fact of which he has full knowledge, that Members by the hundred have said that if you put these employees on the rolls then Members will not be permitted, as they have been permitted in the past, to take three or four hundred dollars or five hundred dollars of the amount allowed for clerk hire and pay it to a dozen clerks at times to relieve congestion.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know that is the reason that has been assigned on the floor of the House in opposition to this amendment, but if the gentleman will read my amendment he will see that that is entirely taken care of.

Mr. GOOD. I have listened to the gentleman's amendment, and it is the same as last year, but it is impracticable of operation, unless he couples with it more help, which means more pay.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not the same as last year.

Mr. GOOD. I want to say to the gentleman, let us meet this proposition. Let us give to the Member a secretary, and let us give to the Member, at least during the session, a stenographer, and put them both on the rolls, just as they are in the Senate. Let us give ourselves at least enough clerical help so that we can do the business that our constituents expect of us. Many Members tell me that they are not able now to attend to the correspondence that is coming from mothers and fathers of boys over there unless they pay it out of their own pocket. Certainly this should not be, and I hope that we can come to some agreement now, as we ought to, to have our regular secretaries and then have at least a session clerk at, say $100 a month——

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Oh, make it annual.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say this to the gentleman, that if this amendment is adopted and the clerks of Members are placed on the rolls, so far as I am concerned I shall not make any point of order to any amendment that may be submitted to increase the number, but I do not say that I will vote for it.

I certainly will make the point of order, however, on any proposition which undertakes to increase the number unless they are placed on the rolls. I think the House ought to have an opportunity to pass on this matter fairly. It is a matter that appeals to one Member of the House as much as it does to another, and I am unwilling to stand here as one Member of the House and by resorting to a point of order prevent the House from carrying out its will in a matter that pertains to the House and its organization.

Mr. GOOD. I understand the gentleman, and I think he is entirely fair in the matter. I think he wants to do the things that a majority of the Members of the House want, and I would suggest that if along with his amendment he could tie up the other amendment to give the Members a stenographer as well, at least for the session, I do not believe there would be any opposition from any quarter in making a satisfactory disposal of the matter.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will say this, that I am only waiting on this proposition to have it passed on, and then I am going to offer a further amendment to increase the amount.

Mr. GOOD. The difficulty about that is that it is subject to a point of order, and the point of order would likely be made and sustained.

Mr. CALDWELL. It can not be, because it will only be the amount.

Mr. GOOD. I should think the gentleman could get unanimous consent, and have them both pending at the same time, and then the point of order could be withdrawn.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, there has been some suggestion here that now would be the time to offer the amendment for an additional clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment was offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] offered an amendment to that amendment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserved the point of order on the amendment, if the Chair understands the situation. Does the gentleman insist on the point of order?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] made the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I want to be heard. I do not know whether the Chair cares to hear me upon the point of order. I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I made the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin is clearly subject to a point of order—in other words, it is legislation upon an appropriation bill. No point of order has been made to it. Now, I think under the uniform ruling another amendment which is germane or which seeks to provide a limitation to that amendment is in order. Now, the amendment which I have offered I think is clearly germane, Mr. Chairman, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, because it provides how this money which is sought to be appropriated by the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin shall be paid. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin provides for $2,000 to each Member. My amendment provides for the manner of payment of this $2,000, and it seems to me it is clearly in order. In my judgment it is clearly germane, for it relates to the subject matter of the amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to be heard?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this same proposition in almost the identic form was presented to the House when the last legislative bill was under consideration. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] then offered virtually this amendment to a similar amendment that I now offer and the Chair then held—and you will find the proceedings on pages 3057 to 3068 of the RECORD—that it was out of order. The provision that is now under consideration, to which no point of order has been made, provides for the payment to the Members of a certain amount of money for a certain specific purpose. The amendment offered by the chairman of the committee provides for the payment to some person, and specifies the way that payment shall be made. The amendment under consideration provides for an allowance of $2,000 for clerk hire to be expended by the Member during the year in such portions as he determines. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee does not provide for any allowance to the Member for clerk hire. It absolutely negatives that idea, and provides for the payment to an outside person who shall be placed on the roll. This is no new proposition for the decision of the Chair. It was more exhaustively argued last year, and the sentiment of the House then was, if I gauged the sentiment correctly, that the Members were not in favor of being deprived of the privilege of allotting $2,000 for clerk hire during the year to such persons as the Members saw fit to pay.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. And the gentleman from New York, who has been so active in this matter, also offered an amendment to increase the allowance to $2,400, and his amendment was then defeated.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for just a minute?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not just at this moment. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] two years ago, after his other larger amendment was eliminated, was as follows:

Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House of Representatives, and shall be paid in the same manner as other employees of the House are paid.

What does the chairman say in passing upon the point of order and holding that it was not germane and not in order?

The Chair is advised by the Clerk that that is the portion of the amendment to which the point of order is directed. It seems to the Chair that this language makes a very definite change in existing law. The basic law does not impose any requirement of this character in regard to the clerks of the Members, or require that they shall be paid as other employees of the House are paid. It is true that this change in existing law is for the duration only of this act, but the principle involved is the same. The Chair does not think that so large an increase of illegality as this amendment proposes can be fairly said to be a perfecting amendment to the increase in the amount allowed by the basic law for clerk hire. If it could be fairly so construed then this amendment would be in order.

The Chair is of opinion that this, like the other amendment, is controlled by the principle heretofore announced and is not in order. The point of order is sustained.

I have before me the basic law authorizing the payment of an allowance to Members of the House, and while my provision is subject to the point of order because it increases that amount from $1,200 to $2,000 it can not be held it is open to amendments that are not relevant or germane. His amendment especially does not provide for an allowance to Members of the House, but it provides for the employment of some person who is to be placed on the roll. If this were in order, it would be in order to authorize a Member to appoint a messenger to aid him in the performance of his clerical duties. It would enable the gentleman, if this is in order, to say that each Member shall be allowed to appoint two clerks or three clerks and fix their salaries. I am unwilling, Mr. Chairman, that a provision should go through without any consideration by a committee. I am going out of Congress. This does not affect me. I am in sympathy with the suggestion offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], and if it is the wish of this House that the clerks of the Members of this House should be put on the permanent roll and be given an assistant clerk——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, will the gentleman permit? Will the gentleman do this? The gentleman says he is going out of Congress and he will not be a Member of Congress. Will he not permit Members who are going to be Members of the next Congress to make the point of order if they desire?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because this matter was thrashed out over a year ago and the gentleman was as insistent as he is to-day on imposing on the Members these provisions that were not sympathetically received by the Members of the House, I intend to exercise my rights as a Member.

There is a way, and the gentleman knows there is a way. He has had nearly 12 months to bring this provision in regular channels. He has not made any steps to do it. Why has not the gentleman, who should be safeguarding the interests of the Treasury in regard to this bill, gone before the Committee on Accounts and presented the matter? He will get a respectful hearing. But, no; he has not done that, and wishes now to present it on the spur of the moment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that at every session, at every opportunity I have had, I have presented this matter and have always met the opposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Why has not the gentleman gone to the Committee on Accounts? Why has the gentleman been sleeping all this time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is making remarks not justified by the record.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman gone to the Committee on Accounts with the proposition? Answer that question.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Wisconsin is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], which implies that I have not made every effort to put the clerk upon the roll, that there has not been, and I leave it to my colleagues upon this floor——

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withdraw any charge that implied insincerity. But the gentleman has not taken steps to place it in regular channels.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There has not been a Member of this House who has been more earnest in his efforts to see the clerks of Members placed on the roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Wisconsin has said that this is taking advantage of Members. I submit to the Chair that if the point of order is overruled then the Members of this House will have an opportunity to express themselves on it, and if a majority is opposed to placing clerks on the roll the amendment will not be adopted. But I am only anxious that this House shall have an opportunity to express itself.

Mr. MANN. There are a good many Members here who will not be in the next House, you know.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But they are not making points of order.

Mr. MANN. What is the difference?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The difference is this: That the majority settles it, but one man, even if the entire membership is for it, may defeat a proposition by making a point of order——

Mr. MANN. Any man on the floor, as long as he is here, has rights.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why do you not go to the Committee on Rules and ask for a rule, if you are so deeply interested?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to make a point of order?

Mr. CALDWELL. I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request, if I may, and it is in order. I want to ask unanimous consent that there be considered in place of the amendments that have been suggested an amendment reading as follows:

To each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for hire of one clerk at $1,200 per annum, and for hire of such other assistants as may be necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, at not exceeding $2,000 per annum additional in monthly installments, so much as may be necessary.

And then to continue as the matter was contained in the bill as submitted to the House.

I ask that in all sincerity in the hope that that will pour oil on the troubled waters and everybody can be satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, be brief.

Mr. LITTLE. When I am done I will stop.

The point of order here is, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is new legislation and therefore out of order. The gentleman from Tennessee comes to us, and this is his answer: He says it is germane and therefore it is in order. It may be germane, Mr. Chairman, but if it is new legislation it is not in order. The gentleman says it is a limitation upon the grant. It might be a limitation on the grant and still be new legislation, and it would be out of order. He might just as well say to us that it was made at the right time. We often hear the objection made that an amendment is not offered at the right time. He might just as well say that it was made at the right time and that therefore it is in order.

The trouble with his amendment is, Mr. Chairman, that it is new legislation. If I can have the attention of the Chair and can have order, I wish to assist the gentleman from Tennessee with the same information about parliamentary law he called my attention to. As I was saying when the attention of the Chair was called away, it is clear that this is new legislation. Therefore it is out of order. It is immaterial whether it is germane or not. That is the argument he makes for it. It is immaterial if it is a limitation, which is the argument he makes for it. Those are the only arguments that the gentleman makes for it. If this is new legislation, it is out of order. That was the point of order, and that is the point I insist on and ask the Chair to rule on.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. I am not quite clear in regard to the wording of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], but if the point of order should be withdrawn would it then be in order for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], or any other Member, to move to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$3,200," and is the amendment then in such shape that that would give each Member two clerks?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes. I will answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, increasing the amount allowed to Members for clerk hire from $1,200 to $2,000, is clearly subject to a point of order. Under existing law they are authorized to receive $1,200 per annum. But no objection and no point of order was made against that amendment, and in the opinion of the Chair an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] would be in order, to increase the amount carried in his amendment so far as that is concerned.

The precise question raised here and involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] was up when the legislative, executive, and judicial bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole last Congress. Then the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] was in the chair and ruled on an out-of-order amendment, the purport of which was the same as the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. The Chair understands the rule to be that a paragraph or amendment which proposes legislation being permitted to remain in the bill may be perfected by a germane amendment (IV, 3260–3263, 3839–3844); but this does not permit an amendment which adds additional legislation (IV, 3836, 3837, 3862). The Chair sustains the point of order to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman, making it "$3,200" instead of "$2,000."

Mr. MADDEN. It increases the amount from $2,000 to $3,200?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes. It strikes out "$2,000" and inserts "$3,200."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUMPHREYS: Page 19, line 16, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$3,200."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that amendment, and I want to say why briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I said awhile ago, the House is in this position: You have had for a number of years a provision of law whereby each Member was required to file with the Clerk of the House the names of those employed by him, and I presume that every Member has complied with the law, and the names are now in the Clerk's office.

Now, by the action taken to-day you have stricken that from the law, so that there is no obligation of that kind resting upon a Member; and here you are met by a point of order to the amendment which I offered, which seeks to place Members' clerks upon the roll and have them paid directly out of the Treasury and not through the Members.

Now, I want to submit to you, gentlemen, under those circumstances, whether you can vote that $3,200 shall be paid to you for clerical assistance. We talk about high expenses, about high taxes. Members are about to add more than $500,000 to this bill. That money will be paid directly to the Members of the House for them to pay to their clerical assistants.

I submit, gentlemen of the House, in all sincerity and all earnestness, that you can not afford to adopt that amendment. For my part, I am not willing to vote this great increase at this time. And to you who feel so disposed I wish to emphasize the fact that you should not do so now, since the amendment which I offered, placing clerks on the roll to be paid directly out of the Treasury, rather than in the indirect way of having the money so provided first paid to the Member and by him to his clerks, was not accepted.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. CALDWELL for the Stafford amendment: Page 19, after line 12, insert:

"To each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, for hire of one clerk at $1,200 per annum, and for hire of such other assistants as may necessarily be employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, at not exceeding $2,000 per annum additional, in monthly installments, so much as may be necessary."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. This is offered as a substitute. That being true, the amendment which I offered has the preference, and will be voted on first, will it not?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be voted on first.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves a point of order on the amendment. The gentleman from New York wishes to speak to his amendment?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood I was recognized.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is all right. I give way. The gentleman will be speaking for me.

Mr. MADDEN. Who is recognized, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from New York having given way.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, of course it is not popular to differ with the men who are anxious to get more compensation for clerk hire. I realize that; but there is an orderly way to provide for the payment of additional clerk hire if it is necessary, and that orderly way has not in this case been pursued. We have in the House a Committee on Accounts. The reports from that committee are privileged. They report all legislation affecting expenditures from the contingent fund of the House. And in order to provide for additional clerk hire, the case should be submitted to that committee before it is acted upon. I am not at all clear that we should even appropriate if the Committee on Accounts reported in favor of it. There are thousands of people employed throughout the United States in every calling who are unable to earn anything like the compensation that is being paid to the Members of this House for clerk hire, and before this bill is finished there will be demands for increased compensation by many Government employees. It must be evident to every man here that if the Congress votes to increase the compensation for clerk hire to its own Members, you will be barred from any argument against increased compensation from whatever source it may be demanded. You can not justify it without submitting to the demands of anybody who is on the Government pay roll anywhere for increased compensation. And if this increased compensation is voted, you have laid the foundation not only for the expenditure of $500,000 which it involves, but you have laid the foundation for the expenditure of millions more to meet the demands from other sources.

Now the question is, Are we in the mood to conserve the Treasury of the United States, or are we willing to pillage the Treasury upon every demand made from any source in order that we may be able to accord ourselves additional compensation for clerk hire? I maintain that I have as much work in my office as any man on the floor of this House, and I am able to do that work for the compensation paid out of the Treasury of the United States. If I choose to employ from my private funds additional service in my office, that is my business.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Do you?

Mr. MADDEN. Whether I do or not, I maintain it is not the business of any Member here. The $2,000 a year is all that should be paid for the clerical force of any Member of this House, and I say that at the risk of incurring the enmity of the Members who are desirous of receiving more. I think the time has come when we should stop and consider the voice of the people. We are already spending billions of dollars for other purposes. The Treasury is empty—worse than empty. It is $13,000,000,000 worse than empty. We have men coming back from the battle front, out of employment. They will be glad to find employment at any price. Now, in God's name, if there is any money in the Treasury, save that money to meet the needs of the men who have fought to sustain the honor of the country and not give the membership of this House additional compensation for clerical hire.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is rather inconsistent. It was only a few moments ago that he was pleading very strongly to raise salaries of $5,000. The gentleman says that he can take care of his work with the present $2,000, and if he cares to spend more, that is his business. Of course, it is his business, and he has business enough so that he does not feel it.

In addition to that, I want to call attention to the fact that the substitute I propose does not increase a salary. It provides that the Members and Delegates in the next session of Congress may employ an additional clerk each, in order that they may do the work that will come to them from their respective districts, and that is all it does provide.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to ask the gentleman from New York if under his amendment a Member of Congress could not get $3,200 whether he employed anybody or not?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, if he wanted to steal it; but I do not believe there is any Member of this House who is so low that he would steal a single penny of the money appropriated for clerk hire, and every Member of this House, when he becomes a Member here and spends money for clerk hire, has to make a certificate to the effect that he has actually disbursed the money; and any man who makes such a certificate, if it is false, not only steals the money but he also violates another section of the criminal law in that he has made a false certificate.

Every Member of this House can go into the Clerk's office and find the certificates that he has made and that every other Member of this House has made during this whole Congress, showing that he has actually expended the $2,000 appropriated up to date. If any one of them has stolen it, I for one will vote to expel him from the House and to call on the Attorney General of the United States to prosecute him and send him to the penitentiary. But I do not believe we have any such men. I am satisfied that the men who are honorable enough to receive the support of their constituencies throughout this country, whose rectitude of conduct has been such as to mark each one of them as one man out of 225,000 fit to be sent here to legislate for the people, are all of high enough integrity to be trusted that they will not steal a paltry $2,000 a year in driblets of a few dollars a month. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. CALDWELL. Since I have been a Member of Congress every month I have been compelled to pay for clerk hire more money than has been assigned to me for that purpose; and if it is necessary that I pay part of it, I should much prefer to pay all than to pay half, because, if I pay all, the people in my district will know that I am paying all, and they will not unnecessarily burden me; but if I pay half, the people in my district think I am being paid for all and they will burden me just as heavily as their wishes require. It is not fair or conscionable. The Members of this House work just as hard as the Members of the other House. The Members of the other House each get more than $5,000 a year to pay for this kind of work. The smaller States have two men to represent them in the other House, while there is only one here from the same small State.

The combined sum paid for clerical assistance to the two Senators is over $10,000 a year, and they can hardly get along with it. Here the Member gets a paltry $2,000 a year, and you compel men to go down in their pockets and pay this expense. It is not fair or honorable. Why do you do it? Because, forsooth, there happens to be some carping individual down in your district of whom you are afraid. You have not got nerve enough to go back to your people and say, "You sent me to Washington to do this work. I need assistance to do the clerical labor that comes to me because of your desires, and therefore I voted to pay for that additional labor."

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. What objection has the gentleman to putting two clerks on the pay roll?

Mr. CALDWELL. None in the world.

Mr. AYRES. Why does not the gentleman's amendment call for that?

Mr. CALDWELL. Because it was ruled out of order. I shall vote for it if the gentleman can get it in here, but the proposition here and now is, Are we going to stultify ourselves and say to the people back home that we can not be trusted to perform the duty here, because, forsooth, some individual in our community will say that we tried to raise our salaries?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I dislike to inject myself into this debate, but it seems to me that the House of Representatives every year belittles itself by bringing up this question of clerk hire and discussing it. It seems to me that the House should determine that question one way or the other and stop discussion of it. I am very much opposed to increasing the allowance for clerk hire and not putting the clerks on the rolls, but giving the money to the Members to disburse as they see fit. I can not see how anyone can object to placing their clerks on the roll and letting the Clerk of the House pay them. We all know that the membership of this House has been subjected to a great deal of criticism, whether justly or unjustly, in connection with the House insisting that this money should be paid to the Members, to be disbursed as they see fit. Why should anyone object to the disbursing officer of the House paying this money? We are not entitled to it unless we pay it out, and under the law you can place as many clerks as you see fit on the roll, to be paid by the Clerk, to be removed at your pleasure. If you pass this amendment increasing this allowance of clerk hire to $3,200, as the amendment now stands, you will not have to make any appointments to the Clerk of the House and you will subject yourselves to very adverse criticism. I do not believe the people of the United States will object to Members of Congress having whatever clerical assistance is necessary for them to attend to the people's business. They will not object to that, but it seems to me, if it is the opinion of this House that one clerk is not sufficient to attend to the work of the office, the intelligent and sensible thing to do is to bring in a bill; and, if it is necessary, you can get a rule from the Committee on Rules for its consideration, making it in order that each Member shall be entitled to appoint a secretary at whatever sum the House thinks fit, and that in addition thereto each Member shall be entitled to a stenographer at an annual salary, those clerks to be placed upon the rolls of the House, to be paid by the Clerk of the House, just as any other employee of the House is, subject to removal at the pleasure of the Member. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman prepare in some concrete form his suggestion, so that we will have an opportunity to vote on that as a substitute for what is now pending?

Mr. CRISP. I can not prepare an amendment carrying that into effect which would be in order under the rules without a special rule from the Committee on Rules. Further answering the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, the gentleman from Georgia is not advocating any increase of clerk hire at all, but is satisfied and can get along, so far as he is concerned, under the present allowance, and the gentleman will add that he always indorses his check and hands it over to his secretary and would be delighted to have him on the roll and have the Clerk of the House pay him.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I would be delighted to have mine on the roll, too, if I could get him there.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, is all debate on this amendment exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL]?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order was reserved upon the amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Then I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee insist upon the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some confusion about this proposition, and I ask unanimous consent that this particular paragraph may be passed over until the first thing in the morning and that we proceed with the reading of the bill for at least half an hour.

Mr. MADDEN. I shall not consent to that unless we rise at this time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I shall withdraw my request to pass over this paragraph. I have an agreement to stay here until 6.30.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My request is that we pass over this paragraph until to-morrow morning, and that we then proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this paragraph and pending amendments and points of order shall be passed over until to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I make the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. It is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to talk about this amendment. As I understand it, as the matter now stands the vote will come on the $1,200 proposition, and if agreed to that will practically make the compensation $3,200 a year for each Member of the House, an increase of $1,200?

The CHAIRMAN. That is as the Chair understands it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I crave the attention of the committee for five minutes. Oh, someone has talked about cowardice. So far as I am concerned, there is no cowardice about it, and in my vote touching this $1,200 proposition, over the $2,000, I shall take into consideration, without any cowardice, whether or not we ought to do it at this time. Oh, yes; the Senate gets more pay for their clerks than we do. That is a smaller body—96—and we are 435.

My objection at this time to this proposition, and probably at any other time during my congressional life here until I cross over, is to the increase. The country is in an abnormal condition. The value of the dollar, it is true, has been cut in two since the commencement of the war; or, to put it another way, prices have doubled. There is a great cry for increase of pay. Now, when this war closes the value of money is to increase so far as its purchasing power is concerned and the cost of living is to decrease. Now, there is a great movement—I guess you are getting some letters from people, people who are forming combinations throughout the country for a further increase of salary. Why, some are striking for an increase of salary and pay all over the country, and in many cases where the salary and pay are much larger than the increase in the cost of living. Now, we have got to consider not our own convenience but we have to legislate for normal conditions, and I do not believe we ought to make the $1,200 increase for ourselves [applause], because we will be estopped from refusing undue increase to others. Now, for that reason, if for no other, I am going to vote against this proposition.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. How much money does it cost the gentleman from Illinois to run his office a year?

Mr. CANNON. Two thousand dollars, no more and no less, and that is paid by the Government and certified. I get along fairly well. I have a pretty heavy mail, and I have got a good secretary. Oh, they say a lawyer makes $50,000 a year, that a merchant and a broker makes $100,000 a year, and we have got the excess-profits tax, we have got a large income tax, and when you get beyond a certain amount the Government takes 80 per cent of it. Well, we pay an income tax on our salaries if we do not have anything else. All that is true; but, mind you, since I have been in Congress the salary of Members of Congress has been increased from $5,000 to $7,500. The Forty-second Congress—March 5, 1871, to March 5, 1873—increased the annual pay of Members and Senators from $5,000 to $7,500 per annum.

The panic of 1873 came upon the country. The cost of living decreased. The severe criticism against the Members of Congress voting for the increase caused many Members to take the amount of the increase and donate the same—some to charity, some to orphan asylums, some to hospitals, some to the church, and some covered the amount into the Treasury of the United States, from which it came.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would like about 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Those were pretty serious times. Now, this is true substantially, the prices that the farmer receive, the prices that the laborer receive, however much they may petition us and send "round robins dispatches," when the time comes that the price of products and of living ceases to be so high the wage will be decreased, and we have got to settle that, so far as the Federal Government is concerned. No cowardice has entered into my position about this matter. God knows I have told my district I am ready to quit any time. I am here substantially by unanimous consent and will be in the next Congress. That is all I desire to say, perhaps I have not said it very well, but I wanted to say that much. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, let us have that amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HUMPHREYS) there were—ayes 60, noes 45.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers [Mr. HUMPHREYS and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee] reported that there were—ayes 61, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. RUBEY. But I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If the gentleman will permit me just a minute, I want to ask unanimous consent that the total be corrected to correspond with the amendment. I have not the total here, but I ask that the Clerk be authorized to correct the total.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUBEY: Add to the amendment the following: "and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be entitled to payment under this appropriation: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House and be subject to be removed at the will of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they are appointed; and any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may appoint one or more clerks, who shall be placed on the roll as the clerk of such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner making such appointments."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment. I want to make it as odious as I can, so when we get a roll call——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 13, strike out the words "to pay" and insert the words "for clerk hire of," and then add at the end of the provision the following: "Provided, That no part thereof shall be paid to any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: In the first line of the Stafford amendment strike out the words "to pay" and insert the words "for clerk hire of," and at the end of the Stafford amendment insert the words "Provided, That no part thereof shall be paid to any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to be a limitation on the appropriation, and under the rules would be in order.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not consider that as a limitation at all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CALDWELL. But the Chair does.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want only a word on this amendment.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. After I have spoken a word or two.

Mr. Chairman, if we are to vote additional clerk hire to Members, it is very clear to me that everyone of those clerks should be put on the rolls and not a Member of this House should be allowed to disburse a single penny of the amount that is voted for clerk hire. It is for clerk hire. It is not for the Members of this House—and it should go to the country as such—that it is to do the work that Members are called upon by our constituents to do. Some Members are differently situated from others. Some Members can pay secretaries fat salaries out of their own pocket and not feel it, but others have not enough to reach down in their pockets every month to pay out $50 or $100 for additional clerk hire. They can not do that, but their constituents are entitled to the same character of service as the constituents of the man who can afford to pay for additional clerk hire. The amendment which I have offered simply provides that no part of this shall be paid to the Member or Delegate or Resident Commissioner. What will be the effect? It will be paid to the secretary or the clerk. I can not support any proposition for additional clerk hire if it is to be paid directly to the Member.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no right to do that under this.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr KINCHELOE. Is the gentleman sure it is going to be paid to the clerk? I am just asking for the information.

Mr. GOOD. It will be paid to him directly. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment. Now, to begin with, Mr. Chairman, we have already voted to increase the compensation from $2,000 to $3,200 for clerk hire to each Member and Delegate. Now, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], seeking to take the odium off the action, proposes that no part of the appropriation made shall be paid to Members of the House, but makes no provision whatever to pay it to the clerks. There is no provision here as to who shall have the authority to appoint the clerks; there is no provision here as to who shall have authority to appoint a secretary.

The time has come when we must call a halt upon this indiscriminate extravagance, for this is nothing more nor less than a species of extravagance and waste of public money. We passed the amendment in the Committee of the Whole, but we are going to have a roll call on it when we get into the House, and I doubt very much whether we will pass it when it gets there. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] The gentlemen are insisting on a vote. But I have the floor and I am entitled to respectful consideration, and I do not care how much these gentlemen who demand to take further money from the Treasury of the United States call out "Vote," I propose to be heard. I have as much right to be heard as they, and I have been recognized according to the orderly procedure of the committee. The mere fact that I object to the passage of an amendment proposed is no reason why I should be yelled off the floor.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I do not yield. I propose to be heard on this question. And I want to say to you men here to-day that you will not dare to go on record on a roll call when this question is called up before the House and when a roll call can be had. These men who voted for this, where their names are not recorded, will vote against it when their names are called and their action can be recorded. The people of the United States will not submit to this unjustifiable and extravagant waste of public funds under the present condition of the Treasury.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee and Mr. KEARNS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I wish to make a statement. I opposed the increase, but since that was adopted I am in favor of this amendment, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent to proceed, but a motion to strike out the last two words is not in order at this particular stage.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, when on that amendment the roll is called to-morrow, or whenever it shall be called, I propose to vote for this increase, with the full belief and understanding that I represent a district that wants the work done here. The gentleman would seek to frighten us by this threat of public punishment if we vote for this amendment.

I am firmly of the belief that I represent a district in which no "short skate" lives. I am firmly of the belief that I represent a district that wants me to have sufficient clerical help to enable me to attend to its business here. The men and women of my district want me to have such help that when the mothers and fathers of the boys, some of them still in France, seek information and correct information about their boys I shall have the means at hand of getting this information for them. If I need two assistants they do not object. They want the facts about their boys. In these war times they know that our work is increased and they want us to have the necessary help.

I have heard Members speak against this increase of clerk hire who have said privately that they are now paying from $4,000 to $5,000 a year for running their own offices. If some man who may live in Chicago or New York or Philadelphia believes that it requires $4,500 or $5,000 to attend to the needs and the wants of his district I am thoroughly of the opinion that men who represent rural districts are just as much in need of that much money to run their offices, and the people of this country do not expect the Members of Congress to pay this extra money out of their pockets. It is Government or public work, and should be paid for as such. [Applause.]

There are a great many Members, I take it, on the floor of this House, representing districts of importance, who are not able to furnish $2,500 additional money for clerk hire. What the public wants is efficiency. We are attending to the business of our constituents, and there is not a constituency in the United States but deserves that its inquiries shall be answered, and promptly answered; that information which they seek shall be supplied to them; and I am firmly of the opinion that there is not a district in the United States that will not approve of such expenditure of public money as is necessary to provide that information. [Applause.]

This is not an increase of salary for our clerks. The amendment does not provide for an increase of anybody's compensation. It simply makes provision for more clerical help for Members of Congress. There is not a department of Government but has increased its office force many times since this war began. This war has more than doubled the office work of the membership of this House, and it is absolutely necessary that our office force be increased if we do the work that our constituents demand we do for them.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. Would not that be an amendment in the third degree, and not in order in the present parliamentary situation?

Mr. SNYDER. Then, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment increasing the amount to $3,200 a year, and if there is any way possible to put the employees that are hired by each of the Members or Delegates at $3,200 on the roll I am in favor of that.

I believe that my office has the average amount of business that each office has at the present time, and I think I have a secretary who is capable of doing as much work as any secretary that any of you may have. He has had a wonderfully long experience here. That man has not asked for my assistance, and I have not paid anything to anybody except him; but he is working 18 hours a day, including Sundays, and that is too much to ask of any man living.

I believe that the people of my district will be glad to have this measure enacted, so that we can have a sufficient amount of help to do the work that comes to our offices, and do it promptly and in time. Therefore I am not afraid to go before my people, and I am not afraid that I shall be looked upon as a coward when I stand here and say that I believe this amount should be increased so that, as I said a moment ago, we can give our constituents the attention to which they are entitled. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For wrapping paper, pasteboard, paste, twine, newspaper wrappers, and other necessary materials for folding, for use of Members, the Clerk's office, and folding room, not including envelopes, writing paper, and other paper and materials to be printed and furnished by the Public Printer, upon requisitions from the Clerk of the House, under provisions of the act approved January 12, 1895, $10,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. EVANS, indefinitely, on acount of illness.

To Mr. FARR, for one week, on account of illness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks—on the pending bill?

Mr. DENISON. No; on the subject I spoke on to-day.

The SPEAKER. On the subject upon which he spoke to-day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MARTIN, OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, March 2, be set aside for memorial services in honor of CHARLES MARTIN, deceased, who was a Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress from the State of Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the gentleman that the probabilities are that the House will be in session for the transaction of business on that day? The gentleman can take some other day and have it set aside.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can pick out a date to-night and report later.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLOOD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 14516) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and, with the accompanying report (No. 935), ordered to be printed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves all points of order on the bill.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 16, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. Resolutions adopted by the New Syria National League.

Whereas the Turks, after four centuries of tyranny and murder of their own subjects, have proved to be incorrigible; and

Whereas the allied nations have accepted, among their aims of war, the principle laid down by President Wilson—in favor of liberating the small and oppressed nationalities and providing them with an opportunity for development along the lines of self-determination; and

Whereas the Syrians, conscious of the unselfish purposes of the United States in this war, its freedom from entangling alliances, and its noble efforts in protecting the weaker races and nations; and

Whereas the United States of America has hitherto assisted Syria and its people and has within its borders a quarter of a million Syrians (with 14,000 of them serving under its flag) who will form a bond of union between their land of birth and their land of adoption; and

Whereas the United States of America has been able throughout its entire history to assimilate on perfect equality men and women of all races, granting and guaranteeing to all equal rights and equal opportunity, whether economic, racial, or religious, and is the country trusted by all the belligerents to protect their interests as well as her own: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved,

I. That Turkish authority, actual or nominal, should not be reestablished.

II. That the New Syria shall be a federated union of Provinces, each Province autonomous within its own borders, yet bonded through one central government into one great nation from the Taurus Mountains to the Sinai Peninsula, free from the difficulties and dangers which beset the severance of one nation into varied spheres of influence, which are bound to hinder the full and freest development of one common people.

III. That the United States assume guardianship and administration of Syria until such a time as the Syrians are able to perform the functions of full self-government.

MINING CLAIMS IN ALASKA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 198) to suspend the doing of assessment work on mining claims in Alaska, and so forth, was introduced by me some time ago and was referred to the Committee on Territories. Several Senators think it would be more proper to send the joint resolution to the Committee on Mines and Mining, as it relates to mining conditions in Alaska. So I move that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and that it be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

CONSTRUCTION OF ROADS.

Mr. WALSH submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $6,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and $6,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, for the survey, construction, and maintenance of roads and trails within or partly within the national forests, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF WAR CONTRACTS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I have the floor, but I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, the matter of overdue war bills, especially those affecting the manufacturing and business men of the State of Michigan, is a matter of a very serious moment to them and to our State as well. The Detroit Journal, one of the great journals of our State, on Monday last contained an article entitled "Overdue war bills," which said:

The injustice which the wage earners and employers of Detroit and Michigan are suffering in the Government's delay of payment for war materials is not only scandalous, but dangerous.

The $300,000,000 due Michigan manufacturers and subcontractors for honest war work honestly performed is a sum too large to yank from under the business structure of the State without serious results for workers and employers. And the twiddlers and twaddlers in Congress and the War Department who are responsible for the delay will be held so responsible if the shutting down of manufactories and the unemployment of thousands of workers follow.

Congress and the War Department need not fear the loss of reputation for painstaking and care in the expenditure of public funds, for neither Congress nor the War Department has any such reputation to lose.

But they can lose and are fast losing the respect and faith of this splendidly loyal city and State, for no municipality or Commonwealth can face the dangers which official delays are entailing and retain any considerable degree of belief in public men who are making partisan byplay of a matter which means bread and butter to workers and employers alike.

The Michigan war material contracts in question were accepted in good faith and rushed toward completion under the high pressure of the war-time spirit. Some of them lacked the yards of red tape which are the official mark of Government contracts, but all of them were given by the Government and must eventually be paid. And if eventually, why not now?

The money has been expended by the manufacturers. The materials have been bought and the wages paid. If in speeding up the payment some individual firm should be given more than its just dues, the Government would have no difficulty in recovering later. Uncle Sam stands no chance of being bilked. The taxpayer is in no possible danger of being cheated. But both Uncle Sam and the taxpayer are going to suffer if the industries and the wage earners of the State are crimped by the delayed payment of the Government's just bills.

Three hundred millions of deferred war material debts is three hundred millions withheld from the industries and wages of Michigan citizens—withheld that a lot of imitation statesmen may play party politics and fence for partisan advantage in Washington.

It is high time that Michigan's Senators and Congressmen give some indications of their abilities to look after the interests of the people they represent.

Mr. President, I think there is just cause for the grievance of the Detroit Journal and of the manufacturers and business men of my State. No State in the Union responded more liberally, without restraint or hesitation, when the Government sought to place its bonds, when the Red Cross was raising its money, and when all the arrangements for carrying on the war were at their height. Detroit is particularly deserving of praise in this regard. It responded to every request that was made for munitions and war supplies. It changed the character of its business, without notice scarcely, and turned over those tremendous plants to Government work in order that the Government might be given the relief which it sought. The Detroit Journal says it is little less than scandalous that these bills have not been paid, and I agree that there is no just excuse for the delay.

I am glad to see my honored friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] nod his head approvingly at that criticism. It gives me confidence that the position I am taking is correct.

Why are these bills not paid? The money is to the credit of the department. I understand that many hundreds of millions of dollars unexpended is still to the credit of the department, that no new appropriation is necessary to pay these bills, and that there will be money returned unexpended after the end of the fiscal year. Am I right? I appeal to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say that the article wherein it criticizes Congress for not acting or appropriating money for the payment of the bills referred to is unjustified in every particular. Congress has appropriated at least $10,000,000,000 more than will be expended or can be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919. If there is any delay of the payment of the bills, it can not be charged to Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the Senator from Utah. His acknowledged accuracy in public statements will be accepted by his colleagues, and I have no doubt by the public generally, as correct.

To deprive the manufacturers of Detroit and Michigan of the use of $300,000,000 long past due is a very important matter. To suddenly cancel the orders that are unfilled and ask these concerns to return to their ordinary avocations is burden enough, but not to pay the bills due is criminal. I do not know who is responsible for the delay, but if congressional action is not necessary, the responsibility must rest with the executive officers of the Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator permit me to make a brief announcement, in which I am sure he will be very much interested?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have the honor to announce that this morning Nebraska ratified the nation-wide prohibition amendment, being the thirty-sixth State to ratify it. Within less than 13 months the amendment becomes a part of the Federal Constitution, the shortest time within which any amendment has been ratified with the sole exception of the amendment abolishing slavery.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. For the first time in history one of the leading nations of the world embodies in its national organic law a provision prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors, a traffic which ultimately would have undermined the foundations of its being. The adoption of this amendment marks the advent of a new day. It is the first step in the new processes of legislation for human welfare which must follow the great war for democracy and civilization in Europe if the lessons of that conflict are to be grasped and utilized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The statement of the Senator from Texas is, of course, interesting, although I am afraid it will not pay these bills. But just to show the Senator from Texas that as Michigan was in the advance in coming to the Government's rescue at the time the war broke out, I only wish to say that we were the first State in the Union to ratify the amendment to which he has referred.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Pardon me, I think Mississippi was the first.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mississippi was the first.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I guess Mississippi was a lap ahead of us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That credit or discredit is due to my State and not to yours.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The "credit or discredit," the Senator says. The credit of passing the constitutional amendment very early, among the very earliest of the States, I think I may properly assume for my own State. But that is neither here nor there. What I want to do is to ascertain why these bills are not paid.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, a great many of these bills are due under contracts that were not executed strictly in accordance with the law. There was a disposition to get rid of red tape in the departments and Congress was urging all the time that the war was being delayed by red tape. A great many of the contracts were simply orders made over the telephone and prices fixed. The Comptroller of the Treasury refused to pay any of these bills under the existing law which were not made strictly according to the written contract, and so forth. A bill passed the House and is waiting in the Senate to be passed creating a commission which will be established to pass on contracts which are bona fide and honest and which are a moral obligation on the Government.

In addition to that, there was a cancellation clause in a number of the contracts with unliquidated damages for canceling the contract. The contracts are canceled and the department is not disposed to take what all the contractors say were the damages sustained. There has to be some provision made for that. No doubt a great many of those contracts will have to be determined by legislation of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Virginia is making an observation which I do not think will apply to the situation which I am describing, for the contracts about which I am complaining in my State were formal contracts. For instance, 100,000 shells were ordered from one firm, and then over the telephone the War Department said, "We must have 200,000; make them now," and it was done. It was done under the initial contract, and there is no reason in the world why that contract should not be paid.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand, under a condition like that, where there was no written contract, as required by law, the Government can not pay for it unless some relief is given.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There was a contract valid under the law.

Mr. SWANSON. In peace times we have a system of written contracts, which I think is very wise, to prevent the Government from being imposed upon. In time of war a great deal of this material was ordered to get rid of red tape for the reason that it was necessary, and I understand those contracts are held up until Congress can legalize them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If there are illegal contracts, of course they ought not to be paid; but I am speaking of contracts that are legal, that have been formally executed and the goods delivered, and $300,000,000 are now owing to our people. It is an outrage and a shame to suspend payment and tie up these industries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the Senator in his zeal overstating the case? If there were illegal contracts they ought not to be paid. There are legal contracts by the hundred that ought to be paid.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not mean contracts that are not strictly formal. I mean contracts that are sufficient in themselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator used the phrase "illegal contracts." He need not be suspicious at all. The Senator just instanced a case where 100,000 shells were ordered from a firm and it is discovered later that the Government wants more shells, that it wants 500,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The contract provided for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The original contract was for only 100,000 shells.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This was only a figure of speech. When the contract was let both parties knew more shells would be needed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They did not need a new contract.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was for 100,000; it was not for such amount as was necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Such a contract would have been foolish; all parties wanted latitude, and the contract provided for it——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. If you will go back and investigate the contracts you will find in every case they were for a certain quantity. Now, then, that contract comes up for consideration before the Auditor of the Treasury, and it is discovered that the United States Government added 400,000 shells to that order over the phone. There is no law of the United States which permits any officer to add 400,000 shells to be charged to the United States Government by phone.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why not pay for deliveries made and accepted?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will come to that in a moment. Now, then, the manufacturer presents his bill for 500,000 shells, and the ordinary red-tape officer, circumscribed by law, as he must be, and as he is, responds, "I can not approve this bill, because it is for 500,000 shells, and it ought to be for 100,000."

We have in course of legislation a bill. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] just said that it was no fault of Congress that none of this had been done. It is no fault of intendment upon the part of Congress or of will or volition, but there is this particular case. There are 400,000 more shells waiting there upon the action of Congress to confirm the telephone message. No man had any legal right in the world to order the 400,000 by telephone.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As the Senator knows, it is done over and over again, owing to the necessity for war materials.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know it was, and I agree with the Senator absolutely that it had to be done, and that red tape had to be overridden and that the law had to be overridden; but when it comes to the officer who has to approve these things, he can not approve it unless he has some act of Congress behind him. He is faced with a bill for 500,000 shells and has a legal valid governmental contract for only 100,000, and he simply says, "I can not approve it; I must wait until Congress gives me the power. I am now awaiting that power."

Let me tell the Senator a few other things in this connection, if he will pardon me just a moment. Here are a lot of mineral men engaged in turning out a whole lot of minerals that were absolutely necessary to carry on the war. We did not make them here. We had been in the habit of importing them. We could no longer import them. The governmental agency acted without any authority at all, because they did not have time to wait for it, and you are waiting every minute to criticize them about it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I deny that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, all right; I hope you are not.

They just simply said, "You go ahead; you make this thing; it will cost you so much, but you make it; we need it; we have got to have it; you must make it." They said, "All right; we will do it. Will you make us whole if we do?" "Well, we will try to." So they went ahead.

Here are the cotton-oil mills in the South, let us say; here is a linter that turned out 75 pounds, and the Government said, "We want 145 pounds. You have got to change your old machinery in order to produce it, and, after you change your machinery the product that you make is worthless except for munitions; it is worthless for any other purpose; you can not sell it for trash; you can hardly sell it to make paper; but will you come to the rescue of the Government?" They said, "Yes." They put in the machinery. Well, within less than six months afterwards the armistice of peace was signed, and, of course, the machinery had not paid for itself and had not paid 10 per cent upon itself.

Now, what is the lesson to be derived from it all, I ask the Senator from Michigan, and I ask him with absolute confidence in the honesty of his reply, for I have know him a long time? I think first the answer is, Congress must pass a law validating these invalid and illegal contracts, unless there shall be fraud accompanying them, of course. I think the next step that we ought to take is that we ought to say to all these people, from those who are producing manganese down to those who put in the new machinery for cotton linters, and the friends of the Senator from Michigan in Detroit—we ought, as a Government, to say to every one of them, "We are going to charge this to profit and loss; it is a part of the war expenses. We are going to keep you whole; we are going to abide by the illegal contracts of the executive branch of the Government, because, although they were illegal, they were necessary. And unless there is fraud somewhere, overreaching, unconscionable bargaining, excessive profits, or something else unpatriotic we are going to take the charge upon the American people, and not leave it to you to pay; we are going to pay it, because we won this war for the civilization, the enlightenment, and freedom of the world."

The Senator from Michigan will find that there are more people outside of Detroit than there are in Detroit who have suffered——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I grant that. I am speaking for my own State. The Senator can speak for his.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that they have got to be taken care of. He will go with me. We will leave this aisle aside, it will not be counted; and we will just simply say to these people, wherever there is a bona fide case, "You shall not suffer because of your patriotism; all of us will suffer, each for all, and all for each."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Mississippi. Of course, he speaks of our industries and the industries of the South, and hopes that they will waive some of these damages. My hearing is very good, but I have not heard anyone down South waiving anything yet, and I do not know that the Senator has heard anybody up our way waiving anything; be that as it may, I am talking about bona fide contracts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not talking about their waiving any damages, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment. It is not a question of waiver; it is a question of justice. We shall not bother with them as to what they shall waive or what they shall not; we shall make them whole and shall keep them whole, and charge it to public account, to profit and loss; but we shall not allow them to profiteer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President, notwithstanding what the distinguished Senator from Mississippi has said, I think that the contracts that are bona fide, that have been recognized, that have been carried out in detail, should be paid, and that the money should be forthcoming now.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Michigan is precisely right upon that, but the Senator forgets a little matter of legal detail there. When I present a claim against the United States Government for any amount whatsoever I have to sign a receipt, and in that respect I waive further claims against the United States Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You take payment on account.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is a man who has made a hundred thousand shells under a valid contract, who added 400,000 shells to the contract upon a telephone message. He can not afford to settle with the Government for the hundred thousand shells because he is cut off from the 400,000, and you have got to wait until Congress gives authority to some commission or somebody to settle for the 400,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This was said only to illustrate how a contract might be expanded. I was not speaking of a specific case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Neither was I.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And neither was the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Just a second. I am talking about contracts acknowledged and the goods delivered under them, the money due, and the money here with which to pay.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And with no element of uncertainty, doubt, or dispute.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. With no element of fraud or uncertainty or dispute about them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if my contract, which is valid and has been validly executed, without any element of dispute regarding an invalid, outside, disturbing contract connected with it, is presented to the Government of the United States, and the Government does not pay it, the Government ought to be execrated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, the Detroit Journal is a very reputable and prominent journal in our State, and it makes the statement that there are over $300,000,000 due to Detroit and other Michigan manufacturers for goods delivered under their contracts. That money ought to be paid. That is what I am complaining about.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Under the law, as I understand it, when the War Department gives an order and sends a check in payment of it to the contractor, the law requires that the contract be filed with that voucher, the contract be of a certain character, written, and signed by some officer in authority, absolutely showing the transaction before the Comptroller of the Treasury can approve it. That is the law. During this war that occasioned delay, and in order to get rid of red tape in connection with such contracts, all those requirements were not complied with. Consequently, when the voucher is given and the written contract is not filed, there is no authority for it to be approved by the Comptroller of the Treasury, and, therefore, the contractors do not get the money.

The House has passed a bill, and the bill has been reported to the Senate, that would cover cases of that kind, embracing between six and seven thousand contracts, which, when made, were lacking in formality in order to get rid of the red tape and to speed up action. Those contracts are not legal under the law existing at that time.

This legislation is intended to obviate that difficulty in connection with contracts about which there is no certainty. When there is certainty about a contract the department has advanced the money, or a large part of it. I think if the Senator will examine the claims for $300,000,000, get the cases itemized, and get the contracts, he will find difficulties of the kind to which I have alluded. In most of these cases, however, advances have been made. That has been my experience. Where advances were being made without the written contract being filed, the advances had to stop. Now, if it is desired to get relief—and relief ought to be given—we should pass this measure and thereby afford relief in these cases.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have the acquiesence of my friends, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], a member of the Appropriations Committee, in the statement that no congressional action is necessary, and that $10,000,000,000 in excess of these claims is now resting in the Treasury subject to use.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, that is a mistake. The Military Affairs Committee of the Senate has unanimously reported a bill to give relief in those cases; and, if there is no occasion for any relief, why did the committee unanimously report the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In any event, I think my friends from Virginia and Mississippi will both acquit me of any desire captiously to criticize. I have never done so; I have gone along and done my part to sustain the administration in this trying time; but I think it is unfair to ask the people of the State of Michigan to carry these claims for $300,000,000, which are bona fide, which are legal, which have been passed upon, and which could be paid by the Government, if it would pay them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan pardon another interruption, and then I will let him alone, unless I am further invoked to further useless controversy? In the first place, I think he will agree with me that neither the Senator from Massachusetts nor the Senator from Utah is pope, and that their opinions are not infallible.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Neither of those Senators make such a claim.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Their merely saying that further legislation by Congress is unnecessary does not close that question. Evidently it is necessary that there should be further legislation by Congress if we are going to make telephone messages governmental contracts.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator agrees with me about that, does he?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the Senator, without any hesitation whatever, that a purely informal contract made by one officer and signed by another officer, and lacking the formalities which are necessary to give it a legal status, must be remedied.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It must be perfected by Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It must be perfected; but I am talking about contracts which are bona fide.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That far the Senator from Michigan and I agree, as we always have agreed during our entire lives of coexistent public service where we understood one another. I wish to follow that up with this reflection: I think the Senator in his desire to represent his constituents, which has been peculiarly a characteristic of his ever since I first knew him—his loyalty to them, his devotion to them, his desire to see them through—is momentarily forgetful of the fact the entire United States is in more or less of the same fix——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very likely; but it is none the less discreditable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With regard to some industry or other; in other words, it is not a Michigan question; it is a war question, and we have got to remedy it. If it be true, as the Senator asserts—and I know that he believes it to be true or else he would not assert it——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think I am right about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say if it be true, as the Senator asserts—and I know that he believes it to be true or else he would not assert it—that there are men in Michigan who have valid contracts according to present existing law which have not been paid and which have been approved by the legal authorities of the Government and still remain unpaid, then I am with him, not because the men are from Michigan—they might be from anywhere. If that is the case, of course he is right; but in so far as that is not the case he is wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, there is no ground for argument there. I would not by the action of any department of the Government validate a dishonest or a doubtful claim.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or even an illegal one.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator made a very fine distinction a few moments ago regarding legal and illegal claims. I can conceive that a claim might be well founded and yet lack some of the elements of the strictest legality. There is such a thing, however, as an equitable judgment, where some of the essential elements of a legal contract are lacking.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And yet if the Senator from Michigan happened to be the official to whom that claim had to be sent for his approval as a matter of law, I take it the Senator from Michigan would not approve it if it was lacking in legality, because he would subject himself possibly to impeachment, which is a very difficult procedure, but certainly to prosecuttion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the Senator that when the Government was scanning this country with a field glass, begging its citizens to come to its aid, and those citizens came to its aid, it is not quite the fair thing to view those claims now through a microscope.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is exactly right; but when it comes to trying them out by the microscope the question arises, Who is going to try them? If the Senator and I were sworn officers of the Government to pass upon claims we would have to pass upon them by the law as the law is written, and we could not consider them for one moment, as Comptroller of the Treasury or as Auditor for the Treasury Department, a war necessity. But Congess can do so and Congress should do so, and the quicker Congress does so the better.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan whether the $300,000,000 mentioned by him includes any invalid contracts?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand not. As I am informed, it is for contracts performed, goods delivered, and for which the money should be paid, and the money is to the credit of the department with which to make payment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am on the subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee to consider the question of legislation in regard to the contracts with the Ordnance and Quartermaster Departments, and the situation is this: There are some 25,000 contracts at the present time which are unsettled. Six thousand of those contracts are informal or invalid contracts, verbal contracts; many of them orders given in an emergency over the telephone or by telegraph, or in other ways. There are also a number of contracts which have been made which have not been signed by the proper officer. The comptroller has stated that those contracts are illegal, and therefore some legislation is necessary to validate them. Those 6,000 contracts amount, according to the statement of the Assistant Secretary of War, to $1,600,000,000.

In order to remedy that situation, so that the War Department can promptly settle those contracts, legislation is necessary. Assistant Secretary Crowell has stated that on the other contracts they are settling them as fast as they can, and they have committees throughout the country, officers of the Ordnance Department, most of them civilian business men although commissioned, who are settling those contracts as fast as they can. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that if he will take up this question with Assistant Secretary Crowell undoubtedly he can ascertain what is the matter and exactly what the situation is and probably arrive at some agreement which will enable them to accomplish a more speedy settlement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I made this public appeal because I have been impressed with its seriousness; and I desired, if possible, to facilitate the prompt adjustment and payment of these valid claims. It is too much for us to carry, and we ought not to be called upon to do it.

What has been said by the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from New Jersey of course should be considered, and undoubtedly is being considered by the departments; but I can see no reason in the world for delaying the payment of these claims that are admitted. The Government of the United States is probably the best Government in the world, and represents the most advanced thought and the highest purposes, but it is the worst paymaster that I know anything about. I have seen men perform service and drag their weary legs through life begging payment over and over again.

We authorized here the other day a payment 10 or 20 years belated. I think under the inspiration of the Senator from Mississippi the Committee on Foreign Relations approved the payment of money long overdue; and it is not a good reputation to get. It is all right if they have not got the money; but the Senator from Utah says that $10,000,000,000 that have been appropriated will be unexpended at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. This discussion seems to be general in its character as applying to the subject; and the observation made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] leads me to make this suggestion:

I recognize the fact that it is necessary to have some legislation to validate these contracts, and I know that several committees are now considering this subject; but I think they should bear in mind this fact, also, in bringing in this remedial legislation.

There are a great many of the principal contractors who have made subcontracts. I have in mind one concern that has six principal contracts with the Government, and on one of these contracts it has made several subcontracts. It seems to me that the money that is paid to the principal contractor ought to be distributed among the subcontractors who have contributed toward the fulfillment of the principal contract. In other words, the general creditors of a principal contractor ought not to be permitted to benefit by this legislation at the expense of the subcontractors who have given value to the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the subcontractors have their remedy against a principal contractor; but the contractors that I am speaking about have no remedy at all. They can not sue the Government. They must wait; and if the money is in the Treasury, and these claims are legitimate, they ought not to be obliged to wait. That is my only contention, and I do not think there can be serious disagreement about the matter.

Mr. POMERENE. I am finding no fault with the Senator's position in that behalf.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There can be no serious disagreement with the last utterance of the Senator from Michigan. There is none. Whenever a Government contract is valid and legal according to existing law and the proof has been made and the proper governmental authorities have passed upon it there can be no excuse for not paying it; but I rose just at this minute, Mr. President, chiefly to reinforce one thing that the Senator has said.

The United States Government is the poorest paymaster in the world upon equitable claims. It is one of the quickest and surest and best paymasters upon purely legal claims. If the Senator will pardon me for a bit of reminiscence——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state that one day, as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, a claim was presented to me as the chairman of a subcommittee growing out of the Spanish spoliation away back in 1819.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was a member of the House committee at the time. I remember it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I looked through the papers, and after I had looked through them I put into the papers a written recommendation of my own, as the chairman of the subcommittee, telling the clerk please to see the other members of the subcommittee and show them my report. Then, looking still further through the papers, I found that Daniel Webster had once recommended the payment of that claim and that Marcy, of New York, had also recommended it. So I merely added a postcript, saying that although not a very modest man I felt further reinforced in my convictions by the fact that Daniel Webster and Secretary of State Marcy, as he subsequently was—he was not then—had agreed with me with regard to that claim.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was it ever paid?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Some time after that my hiatus occurred—the time during which I was neither a Member of the House nor a Member of the Senate. I had been elected to the Senate, but had not taken my seat, and I got a letter from some attorney somewhere, saying, "Do you know where the papers are in the case of So-and-so against the United States Government?"

I responded, "No. I had those papers at one time. I filed a written opinion, and I handed them back to the clerk." He said, "The clerk says those papers are still charged to you"; and, as far as I know, that claim, recommended by three such distinguished citizens as Daniel Webster and Marcy, and me, has never been paid, and the papers are lost.

Now, that is a sample of how Congress attends to business. That is not a reflection upon the Government; that is a reflection upon Congress—not that I want to reflect upon Congress. I have been too long a Member of the body, august and distinguished as it is, and I have gathered too much reflected light from its distinction to want to reflect upon it; but it is true, Mr. President, that if there ever was a Government in the world which took very little account of equities, while it took very distinct and good account of legalities, it is this Government.

I once had the honor of defining a legalist. In a late presidential campaign I said that a certain man was a legalist, and somebody in the audience—out in Wisconsin, I think; it may have been in Michigan—said: "What do you mean by 'a legalist'?" I said, "A man that can not get any hope for the future nor any confidence in the present, excepting from a precedent of the past," and the United States Congress acts that way very frequently.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended, owing to the interruptions that have occurred; but I have nothing further to say, except this: Out of this overflowing Treasury I hope that the manufacturers and business men of Detroit particularly, and my State generally, may get these bills, that are very belated, paid. Three hundred millions of dollars is a large sum, and I think the complaint made by the Journal is justified.

I am greatly obliged to the Senator from Maryland for his courtesy in allowing me to proceed, and I yield the floor back to him.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, in view of the announcement of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] a few minutes ago as to the ratification of the prohibitory amendment by 36 States, I want to say just a word.

This marks the successful ending of the greatest moral battle waged in this country since the abolition of slavery. It has been a battle without compromise, as there can be no compromise between right and wrong. It is remarkable that this result could have been brought about so speedily. The power of the saloon is ended in the United States. As it passes to its grave it can go with the knowledge that it has been responsible for more misery and crime; more destruction of homes and debasement of character; more poverty, sorrow, and tears than any other agency the world has ever known. No one will weep over its demise. The United States will be a better and more prosperous Nation; its citizenship will be happier and more contented than ever.

I rise for the purpose, however, of felicitating the distinguished Senator from Texas, whose name will ever be associated with this movement. It must be a satisfaction to him to feel that, while the defenders of the liquor traffic may sneer at his efforts, the mothers of the Nation and the Christian citizenship of the land are thanking God that there came to Congress a man with the courage, persistency, vision, and love of humanity that he has manifested in standing amidst all the storms of abuse, not only in the Nation, but around the Capitol, and fighting through the good fight to the end.

With due regard to the many services performed by other Senators in this body in days gone by, it is my humble judgment—and I know it is the judgment of millions of people in the United States—that no greater service has ever been performed to humanity or righteousness and to the real best interest of this Nation than has been by the Senator from Texas. I extend to him my heartfelt felicitations upon this day, truly one of triumph for him, and I extend to the State of Texas congratulations that they have in this body the man who has been the leader in this great movement.

THE CENSUS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. FRANCE resumed the speech begun by him on yesterday. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I shall later resume a discussion of this general subject, taking up particularly a discussion of the purpose of my amendment; but it gives me great pleasure to yield to the Senator from Vermont. I yield to him with the understanding that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes. I dislike to break in upon the very interesting and very able argument of the Senator from Maryland, but there is a matter on the Calendar which is of extreme importance, one which comes pretty nearly being of the highest privilege, which I had the honor to report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. As I am called from the city this afternoon, I am very anxious to have it disposed of before going away. I ask the courtesy of the chairman of the committee that the pending bill may be laid aside temporarily by unanimous consent that this matter of privilege may be taken up.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the unfinished business may temporarily be laid aside for the consideration of the matter presented by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? There being none, it is laid aside.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 360, reported by me from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, declaring that the resolutions of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety petitioning the Senate of the United States to institute proceedings looking to the expulsion of Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE be and the same are hereby dismissed.

There being no objection the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask to have the resolution read.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is absent owing to illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Vermont asks that the pending resolution may be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 360, reported by Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolutions of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety petitioning the Senate of the United States to institute proceedings looking to the expulsion of ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE from the Senate because of a speech delivered by him at St. Paul, Minn., on September 20, 1917, be, and the same hereby are, dismissed for the reason that the speech in question does not justify any action by the Senate.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask that the report of the committee may be read.

The Secretary read the report of the committee, No. 614, submitted by Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the resolutions of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety petitioning the Senate of the United States to institute proceedings looking to the expulsion of ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE from the Senate, as a teacher of disloyalty and sedition, giving aid and comfort to our enemies and hindering the conduct of the war, respectfully report that they have fully considered said resolutions and the charges contained therein, as well as the speech made by Senator LA FOLLETTE at St. Paul, Minn., on the 20th of September, 1917, to which speech said resolutions referred and upon which speech is based the petition contained therein.

Your committee have considered the entire case as presented and recommend that the petition preferred by the said Minnesota Commission of Public Safety be dismissed for the reason that the speech in question does not justify any action by the Senate.

Your committee also recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety petitioning the Senate of the United States to institute proceedings looking to the expulsion of ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE from the Senate because of a speech delivered by him at St. Paul, Minn., on September 20, 1917, be, and the same hereby are, dismissed for the reason that the speech in question does not justify any action by the Senate.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE MINNESOTA COMMISSION OF PUBLIC SAFETY TO SENATOR FRANK B. KELLOGG, TRANSMITTING A COPY OF A RESOLUTION PASSED AT A MEETING OF THE COMMISSION HELD ON SEPTEMBER 25, 1917, TOGETHER WITH A STENOGRAPHIC REPORT OF THE SPEECH OF SENATOR ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

[J. A. A. Burnquist, governor, ex officio, chairman; C. H. March, vice president; Lyndon A. Smith, attorney general, ex officio; C. W. Ames, St. Paul; John Lind, Minneapolis; John F. McGee, Minneapolis; A. C. Weiss, Duluth; John S. Pardee, secretary.]

MINNESOTA COMMISSION OF PUBLIC SAFETY,
St. Paul, Minn., September 26, 1917.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor, on behalf of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety, to call your attention to the attached copy of the resolution passed at the stated meeting of the commission yesterday, September 25, together with a stenographic report of Senator LA FOLLETTE'S speech,

Yours, very truly, H. W. LIBBY, Secretary.

Resolutions.

Whereas Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE made an address of a disloyal and seditious nature at a public meeting before a large audience at the Nonpartisan League convention in St. Paul on the 20th of September.

Whereas the utterances of Senator LA FOLLETTE, with all the prestige of his high office as a Senator of the United States, made under protection of a guaranty by the president of the Nonpartisan League that no disloyal expressions would be permitted during the alleged conference between producers and consumers on the high cost of living, have already served to create treasonable sentiments in the State of Minnesota, and being spread through the public press can have no other effect than to weaken the support of the Government in carrying on the war: Be it hereby

Resolved, That the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety respectfully petitions the Senate of the United States to institute proceedings looking to the expulsion of the said ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE from the Senate as a teacher of disloyalty and sedition, giving aid and comfort to our enemies and hindering the Government in the conduct of the war; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution, together with stenographic copies of said La Follette speech, be forwarded to the President of the Senate and Senators NELSON and KELLOGG.

SPEECH OF SENATOR ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

Introduced by chairman. [Continued applause.]

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, it is needless for me to say anything about the importance of this conference conducted under the auspices of the Nonpartisan League. It speaks for itself. It is a nonpartisan league. Why a nonpartisan league? Why has such an organization been formed in this and other States of the Union? Because, Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, political parties have failed to give the people of this country real representative government. [Applause.] What is representation? Every man in this audience who stood up here when you sang that glorious anthem, "My country, 'tis of thee," answers that question. [Applause.] What was it for which men died in '76? It was that the Government established by their valor, their devotion, and their sacrifice, sealed with their blood, should be a real representative government. What is a representative government? A government that represents all the people. [Applause.] And when some of you who stood up in this audience while that glorious sentiment, set to heart-inspiring music, was being given forth—because some of us who stood up at that time have forgotten the sacrifices made in 1776, made in the sixties, in order that that kind of government should be preserved, because some of you are testifying a devotion to liberty which you do not feel. [Applause.]

Who is it abroad over this country now waving the flags and crying out for democracy in the loudest possible tones? It is the business that is making money out of existing conditions; that is what it is. [Applause.] You new converts to democracy are masquerading in the livery of heaven while you serve the devil. [Applause.] Think for a moment for what Washington's Army starved and froze at Valley Forge, warming their stiffening fingers by little campfires. It was that we should have builded up here in this country of ours the only Government on this earth that should be truly representative of the people. [Applause.] What does that mean? It meant the election of two United States Senators from every State in the Union, a Member of Congress from every unit of representation agreed upon, who are to assemble at the seat of Government under the Constitution on the first Monday of December in each year, and there, representing never themselves, never the United States Co., never the ammunition makers, but always representing the people, they should vote for laws that were for the good of the Republic. That is what is meant. [Applause.]

Fellow citizens, when it becomes necessary for an organization, or when any considerable number of people come together in State after State of the Union and seek to form a nonpartisan league in order that they may get true representative government, it means that some power has come between the people and their representatives, and that they are not getting representative government under partisan domination. [Applause.] I am reminded, as I face this magnificent audience here to-night, I am carried back in memory to the early seventies. Do you realize, fellow citizens, that here at the head of the Mississippi Valley, here in what was called the Old Northwest, in the early seventies was formed the great granger movement to grapple with corporate power and restore representative government to the people of that day? [Applause.]

Have you forgotten, or is it possible that the younger generation have never been informed, that here at the head of the valley formed by the great Father of All the Waters was cradled the first independent institution which went out to fight corporate power in the United States? Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Iowa were the four Commonwealths that for the first time in the history of the government of men declared the right of the people to have administered to them a control of the highways that lead to market? Are you aware of the fact that you are inheritors of a precious legacy here in Minnesota—a legacy that has not always been protected—here in Minnesota and in the State of my nativity lying to the south, in Iowa, and in Michigan was born the first great independent farmer movement for the control of railroad transportation, for the subjection of great corporations to public interests instead of permitting those corporations to control ruthlessly in their own interests all of the highways leading to the markets of the country? [Applause.]

Fellow citizens, you are the descendants of the men who made that wonderful historic contest; for, let me say to you that out of that movement that started in these four States that problem for the first time in the history of the world, the right of the public to fix charges upon the iron highways of commerce, that out of that wonderful movement started in the homes of the farmers of Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois—I said Michigan a moment ago; I should have said Illinois—of those four States in the homes of those farmers started that movement for the first time in the history of the world, asserting the right of the public to control railway transportation and railway rates over the railroads leading to the markets of the country. From that propitious hour there spread to the East and to the West that movement the germ of which was the right of the public to control transportation companies until it became the settled law of the land. When it was first asserted by the people of Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois, the owners of the railroads denounced it as an interference with private property and private rights; but the old granger movement, pursuing that great ideal, insisted that when these corporations are permitted to take private property on which to build their depots and their rights of way, that they at once become the servants of the people and their property is subject to public control. [Applause.]

It can not be too strongly emphasized—and I speak of it in connection with this nonpartisan farmers' movement—it can not be too strongly emphasized that that wonderful assertion of a public right was the result of the logical thinking of the farmer as he followed his plow. He reasoned that if the corporation had a right to take his property without his consent, and at a price fixed by the public, on which to build its depot grounds and its right of way, it must be in the same position that the county or the State or the township is in when it takes his property to build a highway, to locate a school building, or to build a public institution; that it was taking his property without his consent, and at a price fixed by statute; that it was taking that property under a public right, and that the highway, the iron highway, the depot, and yards so taken should not be considered as private property. That was a wonderful piece of reasoning upon the part of the men who followed the plow. But let me say that the advanced political thought, that the advanced political philosophy, that the advanced social philosophy of this country of ours finds the germ and the development and the fruitage upon the farms of the country; and it is for that reason that agriculture is the basis of statehood; it is the basis of stable business, of a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. [Applause.]

So I have a faith that this new movement up here, known as the nonpartisan organization, born on the farms of this old Northwest Territory, contains within it the seeds of a great social and political advancement. [Applause.] And, Mr. President and fellow citizens, ladies and gentlemen, I know you will pardon me for harking back to the old Granger movement. I am constrained to believe that this new movement is another crop of the seed of that time. [Applause.] Now, fellow citizens, there would not be the slightest occasion in the world for the organization of a nonpartisan league, and you would not be able to enlist the farmers of a dozen or 15 or 20 States in this union unless there was something fundamentally wrong with our Government. There is something fundamentally wrong with it. [Applause.] Of course, I know the fellows who are waving the flags of to-day most frantically, the bloated representatives of wealth who are shouting loudest for democracy to-day, are trying to invest this particular time with a new form of democracy; a democracy that has attached to it as a cardinal principle, not liberty, not equality, but profit. [Applause.]

But, my friends, you can not enlist the thinking, intellectual, conservative population found upon the farms in this section of the country, which was known when I was a boy as the old Northwest Territory; you can not stir populations very deeply and very profoundly unless there is a profound reason for it; and that profound reason, if you will be a bit analytical, you will find is due to the fact that the very men who are shouting at the top of their voices about democracy to-day are the men who have been pillaging the hard-working sons of toil not only upon the farms but in the factories of the country. [Applause.] But, fellow citizens, I like the advent of this organization, for I know full well that it has already acquired a momentum that will carry it forward. No order from some secret-service employee or from some department of justice will be able to throttle this great movement that stands for real representative government. [Continued applause.]

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, when I speak in this tone of voice do you get me back there against the wall? Are you able to hear me when I talk in this tone of voice back there in the alcoves? [Voices: "Yes."] [Laughter.] I will use a little less voice, because I want to be heard and at the same time I want to save my voice. I have got use for it [laughter and applause], and I purpose to use it for constitutional liberty, for free speech. [Continued applause.]

Now, I do not take the political dope of any papers that serve interests hostile to representative government. [Applause.] Fellow citizens, I come before you here to-night to talk to you particularly about this great movement you have adopted up here, and to give you a word of encouragement, to bid you to be brave, not to be intimidated because there may chance to be sneaking about here and there men who will pull back their coats and show a secret-service badge. [Applause.] Until Bunker Hill is destroyed, unless Little Round Top and the Hornet's Nest at Gettysburg shall have been obliterated and relegated to oblivion, there shall still be free speech in this country. [Applause.] Mr. President, I have stood all my life for law and order. [Applause.] Twenty years ago this very season at a little farmers' gathering in Ferndale, Wis., I opened the fight against corporate power in that State. I was denounced then as an iconoclast and a destroyer of conditions that ought to be preserved, just as some of the advanced thinkers of to-day are denounced for proclaiming, not a new doctrine but the doctrine of Franklin and Madison and Adams and Thomas Jefferson. [Applause.] What was the central thought of the little speech I delivered on that day? It was only this, that the corporations in Wisconsin were not paying their fair share of the taxes, and that they ought to be made to pay them, just as the farmers and owners of lands did. That was all; but that was considered treason. [Laughter.] Just as the same things are denounced as disloyal to-day; but, fellow citizens, I did not stop then and I won't stop now. [Applause.]

And then, 20 years ago, I was just asking for justice and equality in government, in taxation, and, fellow citizens, I came from Washington directly here, and on the floor of the House of Representatives, and in the Committee on Finance, the greatest committee in the Senate, I have been struggling for this same thing that I struggled for down at the Ferndale picnic in Wisconsin 20 years ago. There is not a shade of difference in principle. The only difference lies in the fact that where we in Wisconsin were considering thousands and hundreds of thousands, in this great Government of ours and in the times in which we find ourselves now, we are considering billions upon billions beyond the power of the human mind to grasp; that is the only difference. [Applause.] A little handful of men in Washington have been demanding—only a little handful of men—have been demanding that the taxation should be laid according to the principles that prevail wherever justice prevails, that taxation shall be laid according to the ability of the property to meet the taxes. [Applause.] We have been contending for that principle in Washington, just the same as in a smaller way I was contending for that principle in the first speech made on the 27th of August, 1897, to a farmers' picnic in Ferndale, Wis., which opened the campaign that lasted through a decade or a decade and a half of time.

Fellow citizens, the organization of the Nonpartisan League—and I come back to that as I shall from time to time during the limited space that I can speak to you—the Nonpartisan League finds its birth and its reason for existence in the fact that the burdens of government are not equally laid upon the people of this country. [Applause.] You could not organize a township in North Dakota, you could not enlist the sober, thinking mind on the farms in a county in this great and wonderful expanse of territory if you didn't have justice and right, if you didn't have a real grievance, for there are no men who think deeper, who reflect more soberly and conservatively, and I emphasize that word "more soberly and conservatively," than the farmers of this great country of ours. [Applause.] And I tell you, fellow citizens of our great and glorious country, when any considerable number of farmers, the leaders of the conservative population of this country, rise up en masse to demand a redress of grievances—look out. [Applause.] There is something radically wrong or you couldn't enlist them.

Now, fellow citizens, we are in the midst of a war. For my own part, I was not in favor of beginning the war. [Continued applause.] I didn't mean to say we had not suffered grievances. We had, at the hands of Germany, serious grievances; we had cause for complaining; they had interfered with the right of American citizens to travel upon the high seas on ships loaded with munitions for Great Britain. [Applause and yells.] And, gentlemen, I would not be understood as saying we didn't have grievances; we did, and upon those grievances, which I have regarded as insufficient, considering the amount involved and the rights involved, which was the right to ship munitions to Great Britain with American passengers on board to secure a safe transit. [Laughter and applause.] We had a right, a technical right, to ship munitions, and the American citizen had a technical right to ride on those vessels. I was not in favor of riding on them [laughter], because it seemed to me when the consequences resulting from any destruction of life that might occur would be so awful, I say [a voice: "Yellow"]—any man who says that in an audience where he can conceal himself is yellow himself. [Cries: "Put him out."] I say this, that the comparatively small privilege of the right of an American citizen to ride on a munition-loaded ship flying a foreign flag is too small to involve this country in a loss of millions and hundreds of millions of lives. [Applause.]

Now, fellow citizens, I didn't believe we should have gone into this war for that poor privilege, the right of an American citizen to travel upon a foreign vessel loaded with munitions of war, because a foreign vessel loaded with munitions of war is technically foreign territory [applause], and an American citizen takes his own life in his own hands just as much as he would if he were on the territory of France and camped in the neighborhood of an arsenal. Mr. President, it has sometimes occurred to me that the shippers of munitions of war, who are making enormous profits out of the business, should not have encouraged American citizens to ride on those ships in order to give a sort of semblance of safety to the passage of their profiteering cargo abroad. [Applause.] But, Mr. President, we went into the war by the adoption by Congress of a declaration of war in constitutional form; therefore we are in the war legally. I was not in favor of going into the war illegally. I resisted the right to arm merchantmen when I knew that that would result in producing a condition that would bring about war without a declaration by Congress; and the Constitution says that Congress, and not the acts of the President, shall bring on a war with a foreign Government. [Applause.] But war was declared, and lawfully declared; it was not brought about by unlawfully and tyranically arming of merchant ships. I had a little bit to do with stopping that on the 4th of March, and I put it to my everlasting credit that I was able to do it. [Applause.]

We are in the war, and we are at least lawfully in the war. Now, then, the war entails expenses. You can not run a war these days without paying for it; it is a costly enterprise. Every one of the nations, of the belligerent nations of Europe, is reeling under the financial burdens of the war, this of all wars in the history of the world, has laid upon them. Every one of the belligerent nations, up to last April, when we entered the war, had passed the line of safety so far as ever being able to redeem their financial obligations were concerned; every one except Great Britain. Whenever any Government is paying out for its obligations—for its current obligations—more than 25 per cent of its income, that nation has passed the line where it is safe to loan to it, and every belligerent nation in Europe last April, excepting Great Britain, had passed that line. Never—and this is a triteism to say—never before in the history of the human race was a war in progress that so, day after day, hour after hour, and moment after moment, sapped the very lifeblood, the financial lifeblood, of the existence of the nation as a stable entity—and, fellow citizens, it behooves a nation to consider well before it enters upon a war of that sort how much it has got at stake. If all it has got at stake is the loans the house of Morgan makes to foreign Governments, and the profits that the munition makers will earn in shipping their products to foreign countries, then I think it ought to be weighed, not in a common hay scale, but in an apothecary's scale. [Applause.]

Ah! But somebody will tell you American rights are involved. What American rights? The right of some venturesome person to ride upon a munition-laden vessel in violation of an American statute that no vessel which carries explosives shall carry passengers. Four days before the Lusitania sailed President Wilson was warned in person by Secretary of State Bryan that the Lusitania had 6,000,000 rounds of ammunition on board, besides explosives, and that the passengers who proposed to sail on that vessel were sailing in violation of a statute of this country, that no passengers shall travel upon a railroad train or sail upon a vessel which carries dangerous explosives. [Applause.] And Mr. Bryan appealed to President Wilson to stop passengers from sailing upon the Lusitania. I am giving you some history that maybe has not come to you heretofore—the grievances that carried this country into the war, into a war the results of which, as to the loss of life and burdens, financial burdens, that shall be laid upon us can not be calculated by any mind. I say that the conditions that carried us into that war needed to be weighed carefully, for I annunciate no new doctrine, but the doctrine of Daniel Webster, who said when the Mexican War was on that it was the right of the people of this country to determine for themselves whether there has been a sufficient grievance of the people to incur all the burdens and risks that go with a war of this kind.

I have only got a few minutes more if I make my train. It involves another engagement.

Fellow citizens, I am going to use it in the way I believe the extremest man on the other side will say is loyal to the interests of this Government. We are in this war. We have got to finance it. How shall we do it? Now, let me say to you that there are three ways of financing the war. First, by raising all the money that the war costs by taxation and paying the expenses of the war day after day as the war goes on. That policy of financing a war is called the plan of paying as you go. The founder of the science of political economy was Adam Smith. No one has ever discovered a new principle involved in that science from the days of that wonderful man down to this hour to-night. And from Adam Smith down through the line of great political economists—Ricardo, John Stuart Mills, on down to the political economists of the present day—one and all, with such rare exceptions as to be unworthy of notice, one and all have said there is but one sound way of financing a war, and that is to impose taxes sufficient, while the war is on, to pay the expenses of the war. That you have no business and no right to hand it on to other generations; the generation that makes the war should pay for the war. [Applause.] But that is not all. Those great economists have said another thing. It was an enunciation of a great economic truth, and that is if you finance the war in any other way you impose a double burden not only on the people of to-day but upon your children of the next generation. I said there was one way of financing the war. There are three ways—that laid down by the great political economists of all times, that you should pay as you go; that you should levy enough taxes at the time to carry the expenses of the war. Of course, if you are going to do that you have to put the taxes chiefly upon the wealth of the time. [Applause.] Some people don't like that way. Then there is another way, and that is that you shall borrow, borrow, borrow; issue bonds, mortgage the Government and the generations to come in order to pay the expenses of the war. That is the opposite of paying as you go.

Every time you issue bonds you inflate the currency and prices, and you make it harder for the people of that particular time, because you put a mortgage on at a rate of interest not of the Government's choosing, for when the Government is in war and starts in upon the loan policy it can not fix the interest; it can not fix any of the conditions of the bonds; it goes to the money lender with its hand out, its hat in its hand, and says, "What will you furnish the money for?" and the money lender, the wealth of the country, looks out for itself. [Laughter and applause.] Show me any war or any time when wealth has been patriotic, when wealth has said, "We don't care for interest; we don't care for profit; we are going to take care of the country." Do you know that J. Pierpont Morgan laid the foundation of his fortune, the first $25,000 that he ever made he made in buying rifles of the Government, condemned rifles, at $2.50 apiece, and selling them back to the Government, disguised a little bit, at about $22.50 apiece? [Applause.] Do you know that a part of the great fortune of Vanderbilt, the commodore of war time, do you know how that was made? That was made by picking up condemned ships for almost nothing and selling them to the Government for a good round price. [Applause.]

But, fellow citizens, I wish I could stay with you all night. Do you know that congressional committees in the time of the sixties were busy for months and years investigating the frauds perpetrated upon the Government by the wealth of that country seizing upon the dire necessities of this Republic to make fortunes out of it, out of those conditions? And if you think the animal has changed its spots or shed its skin come down to Washington and see for yourselves. [Applause.]

So, fellow citizens, you have to consider this thing, and that is the carrying of the burdens of the present war. How shall they be carried? Political economy says they shall be carried by the principle of pay as you go, and the big interests want to meet them out of long-time mortgages in the shape of bonds, and thus pay the expense of the war by borrowing. There is not much of a question but that the correct plan is to pay as you go. Do you know, about as soon as the war clouds began to show over the horizon, that 350 of the great economists of the United States, representing the best universities and colleges of the country, petitioned Congress in a petition, the logic and power of which to me was irresistible, that this war should be financed by imposing taxes upon surplus incomes, war profits, and other source of revenue, so that we should pay as we go? [Applause.] But that petition fell into the hands of the Philistines. [Applause.] And if it ever saw the light of day, if it was the subject of comment upon the floor of either House, I venture to say it was at the time when I made the argument against the plan proposed, and in the tax bill which has just passed, I quoted largely from that petition in the making of that argument. Fellow citizens, no war has ever been financed as Adam Smith and all of his successors have said it ought to be financed. Why? Why, because wealth is always potential in government, and wealth never saw war financed wholly by taxation for the reason that wealth would have to pay the bulk of the taxes. As the underlying principle of taxation is that the burden of taxation must be borne according to the ability of the owners of property to bear the taxes, no Rockefeller would have to pay more, considerably, than the farmer in North Dakota. [Laughter.]

So wars have never been financed upon the sound economic principles; wars have always been financed with a struggle between the people on one side and wealth upon the other; wealth contending that the war should be financed by loans, and the people contending that the war should be financed by taxation of wealth, and wealth always being more potential than the people, but I trust that after the Nonpartisan League gets well under way that that won't be the condition in this country. [Applause.] But it has been the condition, and so most of the wars have been financed by both taxation and bond issues, and too frequently the bond issues have been the largest part of the cost of the war. Great Britain, more than any other country in the world, has financed her wars by taxation, and in proportion, in fair proportion, by the bond issues. The greatest wars that ever Great Britain participated in were the Napoleonic wars, and the Napoleonic wars were financed by Great Britain upon a fifty-fifty basis; indeed, 52 per cent of the expenses of the Napoleonic wars was paid by present taxation and 48 per cent of the expense was paid by loans, was carried by loans. In the Crimean War Great Britain paid practically an equal amount by taxation and by loans. But, fellow citizens, every Government that has paid the majority of its expenses by loans instead of taxation has paid a dear price for yielding to wealth as to the way in which the war should be carried on and financed. For always and always in proportion as your loans exceed the amount of money raised by taxes, just in the proportion you swell the prices that the people have to pay during the war, because the issuance of your bonds inflates the currency, and is followed always by accessory legislation, additional legislation, which accentuates that condition.

Now, fellow citizens, what happened after we declared war? In view of this history, in view of the warnings of the great economists of the country that we ought, if we were going to proceed upon a sound economic basis, that we ought to finance this war as largely as possible by taxation instead of bond issues, what happened? We passed the declaration of war; the die was cast; we were in the thing. We had to shoulder the financial burdens, awful as they are. The first thing that high statesmanship required of this country was the making of a plan for financing the war as nearly sound in economic principle as possible. John Sherman, the greatest financier this Government ever produced, speaking after the Civil War upon a bill to refund some of the war debt at a lower rate of interest, said that the financing of the Civil War ought to have been at least upon a fifty-fifty basis; that is, that at least one-half of it ought to have been raised by taxes instead of by dealing with the bondholders. But, fellow citizens, then, as in every other great crisis, the money power was too potential, and the Civil War was financed not upon a fifty-fifty basis; it was financed upon a basis that was about 30 per cent pay as you go and about 70 per cent—when you take the whole thing covering the four-year period—about 70 per cent by bond issues. But, fellow citizens, do you know that we struggled with the experiments, the financial experiments, that grew out of the financing of the War of the Revolution for a period of more than 30 years? Wrong financing of that war was in a large measure responsible for the worst panic that ever shook this Government to its commercial and financial foundations. And you can never do an economic or financial wrong that you do not have to settle for it. And so, fellow citizens, those who were responsible for the bringing on of this war, it should have been their first care to see that it was as largely financed by taxation as possible. There never was a time before in the history of the world when a war could be so largely and advantageously financed by taxation as this war. Why? Because never before in the history of the human race were great corporations making the enormous war profits that the corporations of this country have been making for the three years that the European war has been on and we have been at peace, and those enormous profits warranted the assessment of the very highest percentages of taxation against the war profiteers in order that this war should be properly financed.

Fellow citizens, it is only 20 minutes to train time. Let me say I have got to go. I do not like to go, but I want to say a few words in conclusion to you. I am going to say this: We passed a bill that levies only 31 per cent, on the average, upon war profits, and that, too, when the owners of these great profit-making concerns have had three years of the richest picking that was ever known in the history of mankind. [A voice: "Shame on Congress!"] Yes; shame on Congress. Yes; and shame on the administration, for the administration approved the bill. I am willing that Congress should bear all that it ought to bear, but I tell you that it has got an awful load of responsibility on it. It has not met those responsibilities; it shirks almost everything; it takes what the administration sends down, looks at it popeyed, and swallows it. And yet our forefathers, when they established this great Government of ours, said that the safety of the Republic depended upon the independence of each of the departments as to the other departments—the judiciary independent of the executive and the legislative; the executive department independent, under sanction of the Constitution, of the legislative and the judiciary; and the legislative department absolutely independent of the executive and judiciary. The legislative department was looked upon by the men who made this Government for us as the repository of the liberties of the people, and they fixed the term of the election of the Members of Congress at two years so they could bring them back home and look over their work, so that if it was not satisfactory they could elect other men in their places.

Now, then, fellow citizens, I say that Congress has not met its responsibilities. Let me give you one instance of it—one I want you to put away in your hearts and minds and take home with you and reflect on it. Under the Constitution Congress has the right, the absolute right, to determine the objects and purposes of every war in which we engage. [Applause.] I am giving you the Constitution for it. Why, do you know that Abraham Lincoln, Daniel Webster, Charles Sumner, Henry Clay, and I might call the roll of all the great statesmen of that period, when the Mexican War was on, after war had been declared, and they believed that the war was a wrongful war, they stood in their places in Congress and denounced that war, and Abraham Lincoln voted for a resolution to recall the American troops from Mexico? [Applause.] And yet in these days, 1917, with the flags all about us commemorating liberty, constitutional liberty, we are inhibited from even discussing this war, from even suggesting that there might be some way with honor and credit to our Government to terminate it and stop the awful slaughter and the awful expense. [Applause and yells.] Let me say, in a word, if Abraham Lincoln was a patriot, if Daniel Webster was a patriot, if Clay and Webster and Lincoln and all the men of that time understood the Constitution and the rights of the people, you, the humblest one of you, have the right to discuss freely the question of whether this war might not be terminated with honor to the Government and the awful slaughter discontinued.

I thank you for your patience. [Applause.]

REPLIES OF SENATOR LA FOLLETTE.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., October 5, 1917.

DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your communication as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, transmitting a purported copy of a speech delivered by me at St. Paul on the 20th day of September, 1917, upon the invitation of the Nonpartisan League.

The matter which you inclose is not a correct copy of the speech, but I will not at this time undertake to state wherein it is not correct. I will however, do so just as soon as I can secure a transcript of the speech which is accurate.

At least two copies addressed to me have been transmitted from St. Paul within the last week, neither of which has been received. I am wiring for copies again to-day.

Assuring you, and through you the committee, that I will comply with your request at the earliest possible date, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Chairman Committee on Privileges and Elections,
United States Senate.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., October 11, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Chairman Committee on Privileges and Elections,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Since my letter to you of the 5th instant I have received a transcript of the speech referred to by you in your letter to me of that date. The transcript I have received is from the notes of the official reporter of the Nonpartisan League, who was present to report the proceedings.

I have compared the transcript received by me with the committee print which you furnished to me. The fact is, as both transcripts show, I spoke extemporaneously. I had with me a few notes on the revenue bill, upon which I expected to speak more fully than I did. But the digressions caused by questions and suggestions from the audience led me to put my notes aside. I desire to aid the members of the committee in their investigation to the end that they may have as nearly as possible the same understanding of all that transpired in the St. Paul meeting as they would have if the members of the committee had been personally present. I am therefore furnishing the committee with the transcript of what I said according to the notes of the official reporter of the Nonpartisan League, omitting therefrom merely extraneous matter involving the comments and explanations of the reporter.

There were two interruptions from the audience not shown in the transcript of the official report of the Nonpartisan League, but which I recall and which are also shown by other reports of the proceedings. Thinking that these might have significance in your consideration of the subject matter of the speech, I here refer to them. One is the question from the audience: "How about the Lusitania?" Of course, all that I said upon that subject was said because of this interruption. I had no intention of referring to it. The New York Times's report of the meeting and other press reports show this to be as here stated, and it accords with my recollection.

The transcript of the official reporter of the Nonpartisan League is, of course, at your service if you desire the same.

The second interruption which I note as not appearing in the text of the transcript furnished me shows that the expression "Shame on Congress" came from the audience, and that I replied as shown in the context of the speech. This so appears in the print of the speech furnished by you, at page 11, line 3. With these interruptions, the transcript of the speech I am herewith submitting is substantially correct, so far as I can now recall.

You did not indicate what particular portions of the speech you had under consideration, and I have gone over it generally to make certain that it is substantially correct. As you will observe by comparing the two texts of the speech, there are many differences between them. If any of these differences have any significance for the purpose of your investigation and you desire to direct my attention to any particular language in either text, I will be glad to give it further consideration.

I assume that the wholly false reports sent out by the press generally, to the effect that I stated in various forms "We had no grievance," is receiving no credence from you, since that is contrary to the text of the speech you furnished me. I shall be very glad, however, if your investigation is sufficiently broad to take in an inquiry into the causes which led to the publication generally of these grossly false statements by the press.

Permit me to say that if it is the purpose of the committee to make an investigation as to my statement of fact in the speech, then I request that the committee advise me what statement of fact is so called into question and in what respect its correctness is questioned.

Furthermore, if any issues of fact are to be raised by testimony concerning any statements in the speech, then I ask to be accorded the right to question anyone so testifying, and that I be permitted to call witnesses to meet the testimony which may be so offered.

If the speech is to be otherwise questioned or my right to make it considered by the committee, then I respectfully request that I be so advised by the committee, and that I be given an opportunity to be heard thereon in person and by counsel.

Very respectfully, yours,

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

SPEECH OF ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, DELIVERED AT THE MUNICIPAL AUDITORIUM, ST. PAUL, MINN., SEPTEMBER 20, 1917.

[NOTE.—The transcript of the speech which follows should be read in connection with the corrections indicated in the foregoing letter.]

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, it is needless for me to say anything about the importance of this conference conducted under the auspices of the Nonpartisan League.

It speaks for itself.

It is a nonpartisan league.

Why a nonpartisan league? Why has such an organization been formed in this and other States of the Union?

Because, Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, political parties have failed to give the people of this country real representative government! [Cheers and applause.]

What is representative government?

Every man or woman in this audience who stood up here to-night when you sang that glorious anthem, "My Country 'Tis of Thee," answers that question. What was it for which men died in '76?

It was that the Government established by their valor and their devotion and their sacrifice, sealed with their blood, should be a real representative government.

What is a representative government?

A government that represents all of the people! [Cheers and applause.]

And when some of you who stood up in this audience while that glorious sentiment, set to heart-inspiring music, was being given forth, because some of you who stood up at that time have forgotten the sacrifices made in '76, made again in the sixties, in order that that kind of a government should be preserved. Because some of you are testifying a devotion to liberty which you do not feel! [Applause.]

Who is it, abroad over this country now, waving the flags and crying out for democracy in the loudest possible tones? [Cries from the audience: ["The profiteers!" "Big business!"]

It is business that is making money out of existing conditions. That is what it is. [Cheers and applause.]

You new converts to democracy are masquerading in the livery of heaven while you serve the devil! [Cheers and applause.]

Think for a moment for what Washington's army starved and froze at Valley Forge, warming their stiffening fingers at the meager camp fires! It was that we should have builded up here in this country of ours the one government on this earth that should be truly representative of the people. [Cheers and applause.]

What did that mean? It meant the election of two United States Senators from every State of the Union, and a Member of Congress from every unit of representation agreed upon, who are to assemble at the seat of government, under the Constitution, on the first Monday of December in each year, and there represent, never themselves, never the United States Steel Co., never the munition makers, but always representing the people.

They should vote for laws that were for the good of the Republic. That is what is meant. [Cheers and applause.]

Fellow citizens, when it becomes necessary for an organization, or when any considerable number of people come together in State after State of the Union and seek to form a Nonpartisan League in order that they may get true representative government, it means that some power has come between the people and their representatives, and that they are not getting representative government under partisan domination! [Cheers and applause.]

I am reminded as I face this magnificent audience here to-night, I am carried back in memory to the early seventies. Do you realize, fellow citizens, that here at the head of the Mississippi Valley, here in what was called the old Northwest, in the early seventies, was formed the great granger movement to grapple with corporate power and restore representative government to the people of that day? [Applause.]

Have you forgotten, or is it possible that the younger generation have never been informed, that here at the head of that valley, formed by the great father of all the waters, was cradled the first independent institution which went out to fight corporate power in the United States?

Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Iowa were the four Commonwealths that for the first time in the history of the government of men declared the right of the people to have administered by them the control of the highways that lead to market.

Are you aware of the fact that you are inheritors of a precious legacy here in Minnesota? A legacy that has not always been protected; but here in Minnesota, and in the State of my nativity lying to the south, and Iowa and in Michigan, was born the first great independent farmer movement for the control of railroad transportation—for the subjugation of great corporations to public interests, instead of permitting these corporations to control ruthlessly in their own interest all of the highways leading to the markets of the country.

Gentlemen, you are the descendants of the men who made that wonderful historic contest. For let me say to you that out of that movement that started in these four States, that proclaimed for the first time in the history of the world the right of the public to fix the charges upon the iron highways of commerce, that out of that wonderful movement started in the homes of the farmers of Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois—I said Michigan a moment ago; I should have said Illinois—in those four States, in the homes of those farmers, started that movement for the first time in the history of the world asserting the right of the public to control railway transportation and railway rates over the railroads leading to the markets of the country.

From that propitious hour there spread to the East and to the West that movement the germ of which was the right of the public to control these transportation companies until it became the settled law of the land.

When it was first asserted by the people of Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois the owners of the railroads denounced it as an interference with private property and private rights. But the old granger movement, pursuing that great ideal that when these corporations are permitted to take private property on which to build their depots and their rights of way, that they at once became the servants of the people, and their property is subject to public control. [Applause.]

It can not be too strongly emphasized—and I speak of it in connection with this nonpartisan farmers' movement—it can not be too strongly emphasized that that wonderful assertion of a public right was the result of the logical thinking of the farmer as he followed his plow. He reasoned that if the corporation has a right to take his property without his consent, and at a price fixed by the public, on which to build its depot grounds and its right of way, it must be in the same position that the county or the State or the township is in when it takes his property to build a highway, to locate a school building, or to build a public institution. That it was taking his property without his consent and at a price fixed by the public—by statute. That it was taking that property under a public right, and that the highway, the iron highway, the depot, the right of way so taken could not be considered as private property.

That was a wonderful piece of reasoning upon the part of the men who followed the plow. And let me say to you that the advanced political thought, and the political philosophy, social philosophy, of this country of ours finds the germ and the development and the fruitage upon the farms of the country. [Cheers and applause.]

And it is for that reason that agriculture is the basis of statehood. It is the basis, the stable basis, of a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. So, I have faith that this new movement up here, known as the nonpartisan organization, born on the farms of this great old Northwest Territory, contains within it the seeds of a great social and political advancement. [Cheers and applause.]

And, Mr. President and fellow citizens, ladies and gentlemen, I know you will pardon me in harking back to the old granger movement. I am constrained to believe that this new movement is but another crop of the seeding of that time. Now, fellow citizens, there would not be the slightest occasion in the world for the Nonpartisan League, and you would not be able to enlist the farmers of a dozen, 15, or 20 different States in this Union unless there was something fundamentally wrong with our Government.

There is something fundamentally wrong with it. [Cheers and applause.]

Of course—of course, I know that the fellows who are waving the flags of to-day most frantically [laughter], the bloated representatives of wealth, who are shouting loudest for democracy to-day, are trying to invest this particular time with a new form of democracy. [Laughter, cheers, and applause.]

A democracy that has attached to it as a cardinal principle not liberty, not equality, but profits! [Laughter, applause, and cheers.]

And, my friends, you can not enlist the thinking, intellectual, conservative population found upon the farms of this section of the country, which was known when I was a boy as the old northwest territory; you can not stir that population very deeply and very profoundly unless there is a profound reason for it. [Applause.]

And that profound reason, if you will be a bit critical and a bit analytical, you will find is due to the fact that the very men who are shouting at the top of their voices about democracy to-day are the men who have been pillaging the hard-working sons of toil, not only upon the farms but in the factories of the country. [Cheers and applause.]

Oh, fellow citizens, I welcome the advent of this organization, for I know full well that it has already secured a momentum that will carry it forward. [Cheers and applause.]

No orders from some secret-service employees, or from some Department of Justice, will be able to throttle this great movement that stands for real representative government. [Cheers and applause.]

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, when I speak in this tone of voice do you hear me back there? [Laughter.]

Are you able to hear me when I talk in this tone of voice, back there in that alcove? [A voice from the audience: "Yes!"]

Well, all right. [Laughter.] I'll use just a little less voice, then. Because I want to be heard, and at the same time I want to save my voice. [Laughter.] I have got use for it. [Laughter and applause.] And I propose to use it. [A voice: "Good!"]

Our Constitution will never fail us for free speech! [A voice from the audience: "We don't take the Tribune, Bob!"] [Another voice: "Nor the Journal, either!"] [A voice: "We don't subscribe "——]

No—I don't take the political dope of any paper that serves interests hostile to representative government! [Applause and cheers.]

Now, fellow citizens, I came before you here to-night to talk to you particularly about this great movement that you have started up here, and to give you a word of encouragement. To bid you to be brave! Not to be intimidated because there may chance to be sneaking about here and there men who will pull back their coats and show a secret-service badge. [Laughter and applause.]

Until Bunker Hill is destroyed, until Little Round Top, and the Hornet's Nest at Gettysburg shall have been obliterated and relegated to oblivion, there shall still be free speech in this country! [Great cheering.]

Mr. President, I have stood all my life for law and order. [Cheers and applause.]

Twenty years ago this very season, at a little farmers' gathering in Ferndale, Wis., I opened the fight against corporate power in that State. [Cheers and applause.]

I was denounced then as the Nonpartisan League has been denounced now. I was denounced then as an iconoclast and a destroyer of conditions that ought to be preserved, just as some of the advanced thinkers of to-day are denounced for proclaiming, not a new doctrine, but the doctrine of Franklin and Adams and Thomas Jefferson. [A voice: "And Thomas Paine!"]

What was the kernel, what was the center of thought of the little speech that I delivered on that day? It was only this. That the corporations in Wisconsin were not paying their fair share of the taxes; and that they ought to be made to pay up just as the farmers and owners of homes! [Laughter.]

That was all. But that was considered "treason"! [Laughter.] Just as some things are denounced as disloyal to-day. [Laughter.]

But, fellow citizens, I didn't stop then, and I won't stop now! [Cheers and applause.]

I then, 20 years ago, was just working for justice and equality in government, in taxation; and, fellow citizens, I come from Washington directly here; and on the floor of the House of Representatives and in the Committee on Finance, the greatest committee of the Senate, I have been struggling for the same thing that I struggled for down at the Ferndale picnic in Wisconsin 20 years ago. [A voice: "We know it, Bob!"] [Cheers.]

There is not a shred of difference in principle. The only difference lies in the fact that where we in Wisconsin were considering thousands and hundreds of thousands in this great Government of ours, and in the times which we find ourselves now we are considering billions upon billions—beyond the power of the human mind to grasp. That is the difference. [Applause.]

A little handful of men in Washington have been demanding—only a little handful, mind you—have been demanding that taxation should be laid according to the principles that prevail wherever justice prevails, that taxation shall be laid according to the ability or the property to meet the taxes. [Applause and cheers.]

We have been contending for that principle in Washington, just as in a smaller way I was contending for that principle in the first speech made on the 27th of August, 1897, at a farmers' picnic in Ferndale, Wis., which opened the campaign that lasted through a decade and a half of time.

And, fellow citizens, the organization of the Nonpartisan League—and I come back to that, as I shall from time to time during the limited space that I can speak to you—the Nonpartisan League finds its birth and its reason for existence in the fact that the burdens of government are not equally laid upon the people of this country. [Cheers.]

I am going to put away all those notes that I had made to talk to you from. [Laughter.] [A voice: "Go ahead!"]

You organized a league in North Dakota. You could not enlist the sober, thinking men on the farms in this wonderful expansive country if you didn't have justice and right; if you didn't have a real grievance. For there are no men who think deeper, who reflect more soberly and conservatively, and I emphasize that word, more soberly and conservatively, than the farmers of this great country of ours.

I tell you, fellow citizens of our great and glorious country, when any considerable number of the farmers, the older, conservative population of this country, rise up in mass to demand a redress of grievances—look out! [Cheers and applause.]

There is something wrong. There is something radically wrong or you could not enlist them. Now, fellow citizens, we are in the midst of a war. For my own part I was not in favor of beginning the war. [Cheers and applause.]

I don't mean to say that we hadn't suffered grievances; we had—[a voice, "Yes!"]—at the hands of Germany. Serious grievances! [A voice: "You bet!"]

We had cause for complaint. They had interfered with the right of American citizens to travel upon the high seas—on ships loaded with munitions for Great Britain. [Laughter, cheers, and applause.]

Let me have the time; I have got to catch a train—unless I am stopped by somebody [laughter]; and I have never been stopped yet! [Laughter and applause.]

Cut it out. Let me have the time. I would not be understood as saying that we didn't have grievances. We did. And upon those grievances, which I regarded as insufficient, considering the amount involved and the rights involved, which was the right to ship munitions to Great Britain with American passengers on board to secure a safe transit. [Laughter and applause.]

We had a right, a technical right, to ship the munitions; and American citizens have a technical right to ride on those vessels. I was not in favor of the riding on them [laughter], because it seemed to me that the consequences resulting from any destruction of life that might occur would be so awful. [A voice: "Yellow!"]

What did you say? [A voice: "Yellow!"]

Any man who says that in an audience where he can conceal his identity is yellow himself. [Many cries: "Put him out!" "Put him out!"]

Sit down, everybody. I don't want any of that in an audience where I am speaking. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

All I want is order. I will take care of everybody that interrupts if you will just give me the chance. [Cheers and applause.]

I say this, that the comparatively small privilege of the right of an American citizen to ride on a munition-loaded ship flying a foreign flag, is too small to involve this Government in the loss of millions and millions of lives. [Cheers and applause.]

Now——[A voice interrupting: "Where is the yellow guy now?" Another voice: "Give it to him, LA FOLLETTE!"] [Order!]

Now, fellow citizens, I didn't believe that we should have gone into this war for that poor privilege. [A voice: "Nobody else!"]

The right of an American citizen to travel upon a foreign vessel loaded with munitions of war. Because—— [Another interruption.]

Wait just a minute. Let me state my position. Because a foreign vessel loaded with munitions of war is technically foreign territory [cheers and applause] and an American citizen takes his life in his own hands, just as much as he would if he were on the territory of France and camped in the neighborhood of an arsenal! [Cheers and applause.]

Mr. President, it has sometimes occurred to me that the shippers of munitions of war, who were making enormous profits out of the business, invited and encouraged American citizens to ride on those ships in order to give a sort of semblance of safety to the passage of their profiteering cargo abroad. [Cheers and applause.]

But, Mr. President, we went into the war by the adoption by Congress of a declaration of war in constitutional form. [Applause.] I was not in favor of going into the war illegally.

I resisted the right to arm merchantmen when I knew that that would result in producing a condition that would bring about war without a declaration by Congress; and the Constitution says that Congress, not the acts of the President, shall bring on a war with a foreign government. [Cheers and applause.]

But war was declared, and lawfully declared.

It was not brought about by an unlawful and piratical arming of merchant ships. I had a little bit to do with stopping that on the 4th of March, and I put it to my everlasting credit that I was able to do it. [Cheers and applause.] We are in the war; and, at least, we are lawfully in the war.

Now, then, the war entails expenses. [Laughter.]

You can not run a war in these days without paying for it. [Laughter.]

It is a costly enterprise. Every one of the nations, the belligerent nations of Europe, are reeling under the financial burdens that war, this war of all wars in the history of the world, has laid upon them. Every one of the foreign nations up to last April, when we entered the war, had passed the line of safety, so far as ever being able to redeem their financial obligations were concerned. Every one except Great Britain. Whenever any government is paying out for its obligations more than—for its current obligations—more than 25 per cent of its income, that nation has passed the line where it is safe to loan to it. [Applause.]

Every belligerent nation in Europe last April except Great Britain had passed that line. Never—this is a triteism to say—never before in the history of the human race was a war in progress that so, day by day, hour by hour, moment by moment, sapped the very life blood, the financial life blood, of the existence of the nation as a stable entity.

And, fellow citizens, it behooves a nation to consider well before it enters upon a war of that sort how much it has got at stake. If all it has got at stake is the loans of the house of Morgan made to foreign governments and the profits that the munition makers will earn in shipping their products to foreign countries, then I think it ought to be weighed not in a common hay scale but in an apothecary's scale. [Laughter and applause.]

Ah, but somebody will tell you American rights are involved.

What American rights? The right of some person to ride upon a munition-laden vessel in violation of an American statute that no vessel that carries explosives shall carry passengers. [Cheers and applause.]

Four days before the Lusitania sailed President Wilson was warned in person by Secretary of State Bryan that the Lusitania had 6,000,000 rounds of ammunition on board, besides explosives; and that the passengers who proposed to sail on that vessel were sailing in violation of a statute of this country, that no passenger shall sail or travel upon a railroad train or upon a vessel which carries dangerous explosives. [Cheers and applause.]

And Secretary Bryan appealed to President Wilson to stop passengers from sailing on the Lusitania.

I am giving you some history that probably has not been given you here before. [Cheers.]

So, I say that the grievances that carried this country into war, into a war the limits of which, as to the loss of life, and the burdens, financial burdens, that shall be laid upon us, can not be calculated by any man—I say that the conditions that carried us into that war needed to be weighed carefully. I enunciate no new doctrine. I say what Daniel Webster said when the Mexican War was on at full tilt—that it is the right of the people of this country to determine for themselves whether there has been a sufficient grievance for the people to incur all of the burdens and risks that go with the entrance into war.

I have only got a few minutes more if I make my train. [A voice: "Cut out that train."]

No: I can't cut out the train. It involves another engagement. Just let me have all the time if you will be so good. I am going to use it in a way that I believe even the extremest man on the other side will say is loyal to the interests of the Government.

Fellow citizens, we are in this war.

We have got to finance it.

How shall we do it?

Now, let me say to you, that there are three ways of financing the war.

First, by raising all the money that the war costs by taxation, and paying the expenses of the war day by day as the war goes on. That policy of financing a war is called the plan of paying as you go.

The founder of the science of political economy was Adam Smith. No one has ever discovered a new principle involved in that science from the days of that wonderful man down to this hour to-night. And from Adam Smith down through the lines of great economists—Ricardo, John Stuart Mill, on down to the political economists of the present day, one and all, with such rare exceptions as to be unworthy of notice, one and all have said there is but one sound way of financing of war, and that is to impose taxes sufficient while the war is on to pay the expenses of the war. That you have no business, no right, to hand it on to other generations. The generation that makes the war should pay for the war. [A voice: "That's right!"] [Cheers and applause.]

But that is not all. That is not all. These great economists have said another thing, and it was the enunciation of a great economic principle, that is if you finance a war in any other way you impose a double burden not only upon the people of to-day, but upon the children of the next generation.

Let me explain that. I said there was one way of financing a war. There are three ways. That laid down by the great political economists at all times is that you should pay as you go; that you should levy enough taxes at the time to carry the expenses of the war. Of course, if you are going to do that you have got to put the taxes chiefly upon the wealth of the time. [Applause.]

Some people don't like that way. [Laughter.]

Then there is another way, and that is that you shall borrow, borrow, borrow, issue bonds. Mortgage the Government and the generations to come in order to pay the expense of the war. That is the opposite of paying as you go

Every time you issue bonds you inflate the currency and prices and you make it harder for the people of that particular time. And because you put a mortgage on it, a rate of interest not of the Government's choosing—for when the Government is in war and starts in upon the loan policy it can't fix the interest; it can not fix any of the conditions of the bonds. It goes to the money lender with its hat in its hand and says, What will you furnish the money for?

And the money lender—the wealth of the country—looks out for itself.

Show me in war or any time when wealth has been patriotic. When wealth has said, We don't care for interest or profits; we are going to take care of the country. Why, do you know that John Pierpont Morgan laid the foundation of his fortune—$25,000—by buying condemned rifles at $2.50 apiece and selling them back to the Government disguised a little bit at about $22.50? [Cheers.]

Do you know that the foundation of Vanderbilt's great fortunes, at least a great part of it—the fortune of the Vanderbilts; the commodore of the war time—do you know how that was made?

By picking up condemned ships for almost nothing and selling them to the Government for a good round price. [Laughter.]

Oh, fellow citizens, I wish I could stay with you all night. [Cheers and applause.]

Do you know that congressional committees in the days of the sixties were busy, busy, busy for months and years investigating the frauds perpetrated upon the Government by the wealth of the country seizing upon the dire necessities of this Republic to make fortunes out of it—out of those conditions?

And if you think the animal has changed its spots or shed its skin, go down to Washington and see! [Cheers and applause.]

So, fellow citizens, you have got to consider this thing, and that is the carrying of the burdens of the present war. How shall they be carried? Political economy says they shall be carried by paying as you go. The wealth of the country, that wants to make big interest out of long-time mortgages, especially on bonds, says pay the expenses of the war by borrowing. Now, there is not a bit of question but that the correct plan is to pay as you go.

Why, do you know that just about as soon as the war cloud began to show on the horizon, do you know that 350 of the greatest economists of the United States, representing the best universities and colleges of the country—your own among the number—petitioned Congress in a petition, the logic and power of which to me was irresistible, that this war should be financed by imposing taxes upon surplus incomes, war profits, and other sources of revenue, so that we should pay as we go? [Applause and cheers.]

That petition fell into the hands of the Philistines. And if it ever saw the light of day or ever was made the subject of comment upon the floor of either House, I venture to say that it was at the time I made the argument against the plan proposed in the tax bill just passed, and quoted largely from that petition in the making of that argument.

Fellow citizens, no war has ever been financed as Adam Smith and all of his successors have said it ought to be financed. Why? Why? Because wealth, wealth, is always potential in government, and wealth never wants war financed wholly by taxation, for the reason that wealth would have to pay the bulk of the taxes. Because the underlying principle of taxation is—and I repeat it—that the burdens of taxation must be borne according to the ability of the owners of property to bear the taxes. And so Rockefeller would have to pay more considerably than a farmer in North Dakota would. [Laughter and applause.]

So wars have never been financed upon sound economic principle. Wars have always been financed with a struggle with the people on one side and wealth on the other, wealth contending that the war should be financed by loans, the people contending that the war should be financed by taxation of wealth; and wealth always being more potential than the people.

I pray God, after the Nonpartisan League gets well under way, that that won't be the condition in this country. [A voice: "You bet it won't." Cheers and applause.]

But it has been the condition, and so most of the wars have been financed by both taxation and bond issues, and frequently the bond issues have been the largest part of the cost of the war.

But Great Britain more than any other great country in the world has financed her wars by taxation in proportion, in fair proportion, to bond issues. The greatest wars Great Britain ever participated in were the Napoleonic wars and the Crimean War. The Napoleonic wars were financed by Great Britain upon a 50-50 basis. Indeed, 52 per cent of the expense of the Napoleonic wars was paid by taxation and 48 per cent of the expense was carried by loans. In the Crimean War Great Britain paid practically an equal amount by taxation and by loans. But, fellow citizens, every government that has paid the majority of its expenses by loans instead of by taxation has paid a dear price for yielding to wealth as to the way the war should be carried out and financed.

For always and always in proportion as your loans exceed the amount of money raised by taxation, just in that proportion you swell the prices that the people have to pay during the war. Because the issuance of your bonds inflates the currency, and is followed always by accessory legislation, additional legislation, that accentuates that condition.

Now, what happened after we declared war? In view of this history, in view of the warnings of the great economists of the country that we ought, if we are going to proceed on a sound economic basis, that we ought to finance this war as largely as possible by taxation instead of bond issues, what happened? We passed the declaration of war. The die was cast. We are in the thing. We had to shoulder the financial burdens, awful as they are, that went with it. The first thing that high statesmanship required of this war was the making of a plan for the financing of the war as nearly sound in economic principle as possible.

John Sherman, of Ohio, the greatest financier that this Government ever produced, speaking after the Civil War upon a bill to refund some of the war debt at a lower rate of interest, said that the financing of the Civil War ought to have been at least on a 50–50 basis. That is, that at least one-half of it ought to have been raised by taxation instead of by dealing with the bondholders. But, fellow citizens, in this as in every other great crisis, the money power was too potential, and the Civil War was financed not upon a 50–50 basis; it was financed upon a basis that was about 30 per cent pay as you go and about 70 per cent—when you take the whole thing, covering the four and one-half year period—about 70 per cent of bond issues. But, fellow citizens, do you know that we struggled with the financial embarrassment that grew out of that wrong financing of the War of the Rebellion for a period of more than 30 years? The wrong financing of that war was in large measure responsible for the worst panic that ever shook this Government to its financial foundations. And you can never do an economic or financial wrong that you don't have to settle for it. And so, fellow citizens, those who were responsible for the bringing on of this war, it should have been their first care to see that it was as largely financed by taxation as possible. And there never was a time before in the history of the world when a war could be so justly and largely financed by taxation as this war. Why? Because never before in the history of the human race were great corporations making the enormous war profits that the corporations in this country have been making for the three years that the European war has been on and we have been at peace. And those enormous profits warranted the assessment of the very highest rates, the very highest percentages of taxation against the war profiteers in order that this war should be properly financed.

Fellow citizens, I am admonished that it is only 20 minutes to train time. I have got to go. I don't like to, but I have got to go. But I want to say a few words in conclusion to you.

We passed a bill that levies only 31 per cent, on the average, upon the war profiteers. And that, too, when the owners of these great profit-making concerns have had three years of the richest pickings that was ever known in the history of mankind. [Laughter.]

Eh? Yes: "Shame on Congress." And shame on the administration! for the administration approved of the bill. [Loud cheers.]

Congress has a heavy burden that it ought to bear, and I tell you it has got an awful lot of responsibility on it. It has not met its responsibility. It shirks almost everything. It takes what the administration sends down, looks at it cockeyed, and swallows it! [Cheers.]

Our forefathers, when they established this great Government of ours, said the safety of the Republic depended upon the independence of each of the departments as to the other departments—the judicial independent of the executive and the legislative; the executive department independent, under the sanctions of the Constitution, of the legislative and judiciary; and the legislative department absolutely independent of the executive and of the judiciary.

The legislative department was looked upon by the men who made this Government for us as the repository of the liberties of the people. It made the term of Members of Congress two years, so that they could bring them back home, look over their work, and if it was not satisfactory, elect other men in their places.

[A voice: We will remember that a year from now.]

Please, please, let me have the time.

Now, fellow citizens, I say that Congress has not met its responsibility. Let me give you one overshadowing instance of it, one that I want you to put on your hearts and minds and take home with you and reflect upon it.

Under the Constitution Congress has the right, the absolute right, to determine the objects and purposes of every war in which we engaged. [Applause.]

I am giving you the Constitution for it. Why, do you know that Abraham Lincoln, Daniel Webster, Charles Sumner, Henry Clay, and I might call the roll of all the great statesmen of that period, when the Mexican War was on, after war had been declared said they believed that the war was a wrongful war; they stood in the places in Congress and denounced the war. And Abraham Lincoln voted for a resolution to recall the American troops from Mexico. [Cheers.]

And yet in these days of 1917, with the flags all about us commemorating liberty—constitutional liberty—we are inhibited from even discussing this war, from even suggesting that there might be some way with honor and credit to our Government to terminate it and stop the awful slaughter and the awful expense. [Cheers.]

Let me say, in a word, if Abraham Lincoln was a patriot, if Daniel Webster was a patriot, if Clay and Webster and Lincoln and all the men of that time understood the Constitution and the rights of the people, you, the humblest one of you, have the right to discuss freely the question of whether this war might not be terminated with honor to the Government and the awful slaughter be discontinued.

I thank you for your patience. [Cheers.]

[The Senate of the United States, Committee on Privileges and Elections. In the matter of the investigation by the Senate of the United States of the charge made by the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety that on the 20th day of September, 1917, Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE made an address of "a disloyal and seditious nature" at a public meeting before a large audience at St. Paul, Minn.]

BRIEF IN BEHALF OF SENATOR ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

(Filed by Hon. Gilbert E. Roe.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

On the 29th day of September, 1917, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] presented to the Senate a resolution adopted by the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety, which said resolution was as follows:

"Whereas Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE has made an address of a disloyal and seditious nature at a public meeting before a large audience at the Nonpartisan League convention in St. Paul on the 20th day of September;

"Whereas the utterances of Senator LA FOLLETTE, with all the prestige of his high office as Senator of the United States, made under protection of a guaranty by the president of the Nonpartisan League that no disloyal expressions would be permitted during the alleged conference between producers and consumers on the high cost of living, have already served to create treasonable sentiments in the State of Minnesota, and being spread through the public press can have no other effect than to weaken the support of the Government in carrying on the war: Be it hereby

"Resolved, That the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety respectfully petitions the Senate of the United States to institute proceedings looking to the expulsion of said ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE from the Senate as a teacher of disloyalty and sedition, giving aid and comfort to our enemies, and hindering the Government in the conduct of the war; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution, together with stenographic copies of said LA FOLLETTE'S speech, be forwarded to the President of the Senate and Senators NELSON and KELLOGG."

This resolution was thereupon immediately referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which the Senator presenting the resolution was a member. Senator LA FOLLETTE was temporarily absent from the Senate at the time of this proceeding, in attendance upon a meeting of the Committee on Finance, and had no information concerning the presentation of the resolution or of its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections until some time thereafter. He had no opportunity, therefore, himself to then move for an investigation of said charges either by special committee or otherwise. Thereafter the Committee on Privileges and Elections adopted a resolution authorizing a subcommittee thereof "to investigate the accuracy of the report of the speech delivered by the Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, United States Senator from the State of Wisconsin, September 20, 1917, before the Nonpartisan League at St. Paul; to investigate the accuracy of the statements made by the Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE in said speech; and to report its findings to the full committee the first day of the next regular session of Congress, in December, 1917." The authority of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to conduct the investigation was brought to the attention of Senator LA FOLLETTE for the first time in the course of the correspondence to which I shall now refer.

THE CORRESPONDENCE.

On October 5, 1917, the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections wrote Senator LA FOLLETTE, inclosing what purported to be a copy of the speech made by the latter under the auspices of the Nonpartisan League at St. Paul, Minn. on the 20th day of September, 1917, and in said letter inquired whether the copy inclosed was "a correct copy of the speech made by you, and if it is not a correct copy will you kindly state wherein it is not correct and give us a correct statement thereof." On the same date Senator LA FOLLETTE replied to this letter advising the chairman of the committee that the purported copy of the speech inclosed with the chairman's letter was not a correct copy and assuring the chairman that he would comply with his request to furnish the committee with a correct copy at as early a day as possible. On October 11 following Senator LA FOLLETTE wrote the chairman of the committee advising him that a copy of the speech had been procured from the official stenographer who reported the meeting and inclosed the same, together with the explanation that certain interruptions from the audience, to which reply was made, did not appear in the speech, and offering to the committee the original transcript of the official report of the meeting in question. This letter explains that, as the transcript in fact shows, the speech was made extemporaneously, and that while Senator LA FOLLETTE had with him a few notes on the revenue bill recently under consideration by the Senate, upon which he expected to speak, there were various digressions in the speech caused by questions and suggestions from the audience. In this letter Senator LA FOLLETTE also requested to be advised whether the accuracy of any statements of fact in the speech was called into question; and if so, in what respect; and also inquired whether the Senator's right to make the speech was questioned. In this letter Senator LA FOLLETTE also stated that if an investigation was to be conducted he desired to be heard in person and by counsel and be allowed to cross-examine witnesses, and thereafter produce evidence in his own behalf if he desired. To this letter the chairman of the subcommittee replied, under date of October 12, 1917, that its powers did not extend to an inquiry into the right of Senator LA FOLLETTE to make the speech, such question being reserved for the consideration of the full committee, and that it had no authority to inquire into the causes which led to the publication of the grossly false reports of the speech, to which Senator LA FOLLETTE had called attention in his previous letter. The chairman of the subcommittee, however, in this letter invited Senator LA FOLLETTE to appear before it "to be heard and to inform the committee with reference to the accuracy of various statements contained in the speech." To this letter Senator LA FOLLETTE replied, under date of October 13, respectfully pointing out to the chairman of the subcommittee the fact that the procedure proposed required Senator LA FOLLETTE to support the accuracy of all statements in the speech in advance of any information that any of these statements were challenged or questioned by anyone, or, if any statements therein were challenged, without any specifications as to which ones were challenged, or in what respect, or by whom, or in what manner their accuracy was questioned.

On October 15, 1917, the subcommittee replied to Senator LA FOLLETTE'S letter of the 13th instant, stating the substance of the resolution of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety and reciting the resolution of the Committee on Privileges and Elections appointing the subcommittee, which resolution has been previously quoted, and stating that with the assistance given to the subcommittee by Senator LA FOLLETTE in furnishing a copy of the speech in question the only other question which the subcommittee was authorized to investigate was "the accuracy of the statements contained in the speech." In this letter Senator LA FOLLETTE was informed that the next meeting of the committee would be held on the 16th instant at the committee room of the Committee on Privileges and Elections at 10.30 a. m., at which time Senator LA FOLLETTE was invited to be present to be interrogated by "each member" of the committee concerning "such portion of the address in question as to him may seem open to question." On the 16th day of October, 1917, Senator LA FOLLETTE appeared before the subcommittee and filed with it the letter of that date addressed to the chairman which appears in the correspondence. In this letter or statement Senator LA FOLLETTE asserts that as a matter of course he believed that all statements made by him in the speech were correct and accurate at the time he made them, and that he still believed them to be so. That if the correctness of anything he said in the speech was challenged by anyone he desired to know what statements were so challenged, and requested that he be allowed simply the plain rights accorded to all men in all proceedings which have for their object the ascertainment of the truth, to wit, the right to cross-examine witnesses produced against him, and thereafter the right, if he desired, to introduce evidence to meet that offered against him. He pointed out that every Senator and every man was entitled to have the statements made by him accepted as accurate, at least until some one appeared to question their accuracy, and that to deny that right to any individual or Senator would be an insult. Senator LA FOLLETTE in this letter again insisted upon his right to meet face to face and question any witnesses that might challenge the correctness of any statement made by him in the speech and to produce in his own behalf such witnesses and evidence, if any, as he deemed necessary or proper to controvert the adverse evidence offered, and he concluded by requesting the committee to make the investigation "thorough and complete to the end that it shall do justice to all participants and shall constitute an honorable precedent whenever so grave a matter as the proposed expulsion of one of its Members shall come before the United States Senate."

Thereafter the chairman of the committee advised Senator LA FOLLETTE that an adjournment of the proceedings had been taken to November 26, 1917, and on October 26, 1917, Senator LA FOLLETTE wrote the chairman of the subcommittee as follows:

"In order to be informed of the proceedings contemplated by your subcommittee at its next meeting, will you advise me:

"(1) Whether at the meeting of the subcommittee on November 26 any witnesses will be produced to testify to any inaccuracies of statement in the St. Paul speech; and if so, whether I will be accorded the opportunity to cross-examine such witnesses at that time or later if I think further time necessary to prepare for cross-examination after hearing the testimony in chief.

"(2) Whether any documentary evidence will be offered at that time to show any inaccuracies in the speech; and if so, whether reasonable time and opportunity will be given me to rebut the same.

"(3) Whether the subcommittee or its members have collected and will consider any evidence not offered and received at regular sessions of the subcommittee; and if so, whether such evidence will be submitted to me or my counsel if I desire it for inspection and thereafter reasonable time afforded me to reply to the same.

"(4) Has the subcommittee authority to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents in my behalf, either at the next meeting thereof or at any adjourned meeting, if I desire to subpœna such witnesses and desire the production of records and documents after having learned what evidence, if any, the subcommittee has received to show inaccuracies or errors in said speech?

"The time fixed by you for the next meeting of the subcommittee is so close to the opening of the next session of Congress, when you advise me you are required to report to the full committee, that I respectfully suggest that the investigation would be greatly facilitated if you would furnish me a statement of the witnesses, if any, it is expected to call and the matters to which their testimony will be directed and a list of the papers or documents, so far as you may be advised, which the subcommittee expects to consider and which you may believe raise any question concerning the accuracy of any matters of fact stated in the speech. I wish that such statement or information might be in my hands at least a week before the next meeting of your subcommittee."

On November 5 the chairman of the committee replied to Senator LA FOLLETTE as follows:

"CANTON, OHIO, November 5, 1917.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: Your favor of the 26th ultimo received relative to the hearings to be held before the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections on November 26, 1917.

"In reply I beg to say that our former correspondence relative to this subject indicates very clearly that you will be given full opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses and inspect documents. It seems to me that until the contrary appears it might be assumed that the subcommittee wants all the facts which are material and relevant to the issues before it and which may not be incompatible with the public interest to disclose. It can be assumed also that both the subcommittee and the full committee will base whatever conclusions they come to upon evidence which you will have an opportunity to examine and upon no other evidence.

"I do not have the correspondence which has passed between us here in Canton, but you have been advised that the inquiry of the subcommittee would be limited to two questions: First, Was the copy of the speech which was referred to the subcommittee an accurate transcript of the speech delivered, and, secondly, are the statements contained therein accurate?

"If after the witnesses are examined who may be called by the committee, it shall appear that further reasonable time is required by yourself or your counsel to produce other witnesses, or to further examine the testimony, I have no doubt it will be granted. In any event, I will make such request.

"In the absence of the other members of the subcommittee I do not deem myself authorized to make any further statement.

"Very sincerely.

"ATLEE POMERENE,
"Chairman Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections.

"Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C."

The balance of the correspondence merely shows that while Senator LA FOLLETTE was ready with counsel to proceed with the hearing on the 26th of November, 1917, and all subsequent dates to which the hearings were adjourned, the subcommittee, on its own motion, adjourned the hearing from November 26 to a subsequent date, and that the committee has, from time to time thereafter, adjourned said hearing without taking further action of any sort.

I have not attempted to set forth the full correspondence between the subcommittee and Senator LA FOLLETTE, which is, however, a matter of record and in the possession of the committee, but I believe that the foregoing faithfully summarizes the more important points thereof and sufficiently shows the history and present status of the proceeding.

POINT I.

The speech of September 20, 1917, affords no reason for expelling Senator LA FOLLETTE, and the charge of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety based thereon is both frivolous and scandalous.

It is now nearly eight months since the charge of disloyalty based upon this speech was presented to the Senate. While Senator LA FOLLETTE had no opportunity at the time it was lodged with the Senate to move for an investigation of the charge for the reasons previously stated, he has, as the record shows, done what he could to expediate the hearings and bring the matter to a conclusion. Had the Senate or the members of the committee to which the resolution was referred even entertained a suspicion that the charge of disloyalty made against Senator LA FOLLETTE had the slightest basis in fact, the charge would long ago have been thoroughly investigated and appropriate action taken thereon. To suppose otherwise is to assume that the Senate is indifferent to the loyalty of its own membership in this great crisis of our Nation's life. I have no hesitation in affirming that if there were any Member of either House of Congress to-day whose unswerving loyalty and devotion to his country's cause was doubted, not one day would pass before a sweeping and thorough investigation would be made of such Member's loyalty.

But to pass over these baseless and wanton charges without appropriate action by the Senate would not only be a great wrong to Senator LA FOLLETTE but to the public as well, and would furnish a vicious precedent, from the evil consequences of which no Senator in the country would be safe. I have therefore collected and herewith submit the precedents which plainly declare the power and duty of the Senate in this case, and in connection therewith present a brief analysis of the speech alleged to be "disloyal" and "seditious" and to have created "treasonable sentiments" in the State of Minnesota. Before examining the speech, I invite attention to all the precedents established by the Senator so far as they have any bearing on this case, and also to the right of the citizens, and particularly Members of Congress, to criticize and, under some circumstances, to condemn the acts of the Government in time of war.

I shall take up no time in discussing the constitutional power of the Senate to expel a Member. It is provided in article 1, section 5:

"Each House may determine the rules of its own proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member."

The power of the Senate to expel a Member is limited only by the provision that it shall take a two-thirds vote to do it; otherwise all is left to the conscience and wisdom of the Senate. A two-thirds majority of the Senate may expel a Member for any reason or for no reason. No tribunal has been created to review its judgment in such matters. The sole remedy for abuse of this power rests with the people. The framers of the Constitution believed, and their belief has been justified by the uniform action of the Senate, that this power would never be exercised arbitrarily or captiously as the result of personal or political animosity. During the 130 years of the life of the Senate the principles have become well settled which control its action in cases where it is sought to expel a Member, and those principles are embodied in the precedents to which I now call attention.

1. The precedents.

a. The case of Humphrey Marshall.

The first case in which the Senate had occasion to consider its power to expel a Member was that of Humphrey Marshall, of Kentucky. This case is reported briefly in the compilation of Senate Election Cases from 1789–1913, Senate Documents, volume 9, page 168. See also history of this case in the transcript of the Senate proceedings, Annals of Congress, first session, Fourth Congress, 1795–96, pages 47–50; also Hinds' Precedents, volume 2, page 858.

It appears from the report of the above case that in February, 1796, the Vice President laid down before the Senate a letter from the governor of Kentucky and a memorial from the Representatives of said State, in which it was made to appear that Senator Marshall had been guilty of perjury in a proceeding in court. It appears that the court proceeding in question occurred several months before Mr. Marshall was elected to the Senate. The memorial or petition was referred to a special committee on motion of Mr. Marshall himself. The committee thereafter made a report exonerating Senator Marshall, which was adopted by a vote of 16 to 8. The principal propositions contained in the report were voted on separately and the whole document was carefully considered. The report is as follows:

"The committee to whom was referred the letter of the governor and the memorial of the Representatives of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, report:

"That the representatives of the freemen of Kentucky state in their memorial that in February, 1795, a pamphlet was published by George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian (who were two judges of the court of appeals), in which they say that Humphrey Marshall had a suit in chancery in the said court of appeals, in which it appearing manifest from the oath of the complainant, from disinterested testimony, from records, from documents furnished by himself, and from the contradictions contained in his own answer that he had committed a gross fraud, the court gave a decree against him, and that in the course of the investigation he was publicly charged with perjury. That Mr. Marshall, in a publication in the Kentucky Gazette, called for a specification of the charge, to which the said George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian, in like publication, replied that he was guilty of perjury in his answer to the bill in chancery exhibited against him by James Wilkinson, and that they would plead justification to any suit brought against them therefor. That no such suit, as the said representatives could learn, had been brought. The said representatives further say that they do not mean to give an opinion on the justice of the said charge, but request that an investigation may immediately take place relative thereto.

"Your committee observe that the said suit was tried 18 months before Mr. Marshall was chosen a member of the Senate, and that previous to his election mutual accusations had taken place between him and the judges of the said court relating to the same suit.

"The representatives of Kentucky have not furnished any copy of Mr. Marshall's answer on oath, nor have they stated any part of the testimony or produced any of the said records or documents or the copy of any paper in the cause, nor have they intimated a design to bring forward those or any other proofs.

"Your committee are informed by the other Senator and the two Representatives in Congress from Kentucky that they have not been requested by the legislature of that State to prosecute this inquiry, and that they are not possessed of any evidence in the case, and that they believe no person is authorized to appear on behalf of the legislature.

"Mr. Marshall is solicitous that a full investigation of the subject shall take place in the Senate and urges the principle that consent takes away error, as applying on this occasion, to give the Senate jurisdiction; but as no person appears to prosecute and there is no evidence adduced to the Senate, nor even a specific charge, the committee think any further inquiry by the Senate would be improper. If there were no objection of this sort the committee would still be of opinion that the memorial could not be sustained. They think that in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that in all such prosecutions the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. If, in the present case, the party has been guilty in the manner suggested, no reason has been alleged by the memorialists why he has not long since been tried in the State and district where he committed the offense. Until he is legally convicted the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent, and the committee are compelled, by a sense of justice, to declare that in their opinion the presumption in favor of Mr. Marshall is not diminished by the recriminating publications which manifest strong resentment against him.

"And they are also of opinion that as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate the consent of the party can not give it; and that therefore the said memorial ought to be dismissed.

"Resolved, That the Vice President of the United States is requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing report to the governor of Kentucky."

b. The case of William Blount.

The next case of expulsion dealt with by the Senate is that of William Blount, which occurred in 1797. This case is reported in compilation of Senate Election Cases, supra, page 1165; see also Hinds' Precedents, volume 2, page 813; also first session, Fifth Congress, Senate Journal, page 383; see particularly for the facts Blount's impeachment proceedings, Annals first and second sessions, Fifth Congress, volume 1, pages 39–45; Annals second and third sessions, Fifth Congress, volume 2, pages 2245–2416.

The proceedings against Blount originated in a letter written by him to one Carey, an employee of the United States Government, in the Indian Service, in the Indian Territory. The letter is published in the compilation of Senate Election Cases, supra, page 1167. The facts of this case can be found in the Annals of Congress referred to above, and show that William Blount, a United States Senator from the State of Tennessee, was engaged in a conspiracy with divers persons in this country and in England to rob the Indians of their lands, to debauch them by the sale of liquor, encourage and incite them to engage in hostile operation against the interests of the United States and the Government of Spain, to make false reports concerning the character and conduct of the United States officials charged with the duty of protecting the Indians, and to do all this in alliance with British agents, subjects of the country with which the United States had recently been at war. Blount neither admitted nor denied the charges, nor attempted in any way to defend himself against them, although he was accorded the privilege of being represented by counsel, and was furnished copies of all papers which were made the subject of investigation, and obtained various adjournments from the select committee appointed to consider the case. Under the circumstances there was nothing to do but expel him from the Senate, and this was accordingly done by resolution, which provided:

"That William Blount, Esq., one of the Senators of the United States, having been guilty of high misdemeanors entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator, be, and he hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States."

This resolution was adopted with only one dissenting vote.

c. The case of John Smith.

The next case in point of time was that of the Hon. John Smith, Senator from the State of Ohio, charged with complicity in the conspiracy of Aaron Burr. The case is reported in the compilation of Senate Election Cases referred to, supra, at page 1170. The history of the case is given in the Senate Journal, Tenth Congress, first session, with the report of the committee from the Annals of Congress (10th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 1, pp. 56–62, and the debate is found on pp. 39–42; also pp. 265–324). This case is also found in Hinds' Precedents, volume 2, page 815 and subsequent pages.

In this case the Senate, on November 27, 1807, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether it be compatible with the honor and privileges of this House that John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio, against whom bills of indictment have been found at the Circuit Court of Virginia, held in Richmond in August last, for treason and misdemeanor, shall be permitted any longer to have a seat therein; and that the committee do inquire into all the facts regarding the conduct of Mr. Smith as an alleged associate of Aaron Burr and report the same to the Senate."

See first session, Tenth Congress, Senate Journal, page 197, Annals 39. On December 31 following Mr. Adams, chairman of the committee, announced that the committee was ready to report, and made a motion, which was read and agreed to, "That John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio, be notified by the Vice President, to attend in his place." The Vice President accordingly notified Mr. Smith in the following words: "Sir, you are hereby required to attend the Senate in your place without delay. By order of the Senate. Signed, George Clinton, President of the Senate." Mr. Adams thereupon made his report.

In that report it is stated:

"Your committee are of opinion that the conspiracy of Aaron Burr and his associates against the peace, union, and liberties of these States is of such a character and that its existence is established by such a mass of concurring and mutually corroborative testimony that it is incompatible not only with the honor and privileges of this House, but with the deepest interest of this Nation, that any person engaged in it shall be permitted to hold a seat in the Senate of the United States. Whether the facts of which the committee submit here, with such evidence as under the order of the Senate they have been able to collect, are sufficient to substantiate the participation of Mr. Smith in that conspiracy or not will remain for the Senate to decide. The committee submit also to the consideration of the Senate the correspondence between Mr. Smith and them, through their chairman, in the course of their meetings.

"The committee have never conceived themselves invested with authority to try Mr. Smith. Their charge was to report an opinion relating to the honor and privileges of the Senate and the facts relating to the conduct of Mr. Smith. Their opinion, indeed, can not be expressed in relation to the privileges of the Senate without relating at the same time to Mr. Smith's right of holding a seat in this body, but in that respect the authority of the committee extends only to proposal and not to decision. But as he manifested a great solicitude to be heard before them, they obtained permission from the Senate to permit his attendance, communicated to him the evidence in their possession by which he was inculpated, furnished him in writing with the questions arising from the information, and explanations herewith submitted as a part of the facts reported."

The committee investigating the charges against Senator Smith, of which Senator John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, was chairman, was composed of the most distinguished Senators of that day, and its report deals extensively with the facts of the case and concluded with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio, by his participation in the conspiracy of Aaron Burr against the peace, union, and liberties of the people of the United States, has been guilty of conduct incompatible with his duty and station as a Senator of the United States, and that he be therefore, and hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States."

The trial, argument, and debate on the case in the Senate occupied many days. The evidence, too voluminous to be here summarized, seems to leave no doubt that Senator Smith was an accomplice of Aaron Burr, and shows that the accused Senator was at least guilty of conspiring with Burr and others against the peace and union of the United States. Nevertheless, the resolution for expulsion failed to receive the necessary two-thirds vote and was not adopted.

Various cases of expulsion grew out of the Civil War. In a number of cases Members of the Congress simply went with their States when they seceded, and their expulsion was a mere matter of form. In other cases it was evident that the Senator's sympathy was entirely with the rebellious States, but in no case was a Senator expelled for expression of opinion, however strong, in favor of the justice of the Southern cause or the injustice of the cause of the North. It was only where some overt act of positive disloyalty, such as communicating with the enemy to his advantage or furnishing money or material aid to some one engaged in the rebellion, could be brought home to the Senator that he was expelled. The Senate was very careful to distinguish between overt acts and opinions, no matter how strongly the opinions may have been expressed. I will now call attention to two leading cases dealing with this distinction.

d. The case of Benjamin Stark.

Benjamin Stark was appointed Senator by the governor of the State of Oregon in 1861 and presented his credentials to the Senate in January, 1862. Some question concerning his loyalty was raised before Senator Stark was sworn in, but he was allowed to take the oath, and a committee of the Senate was afterwards appointed to investigate the charges of disloyalty against him. Much of the testimony relied on to unseat him was that taken in the State of Oregon to prevent his appointment, the taking of which was completed about November 21, 1861. The case is reported in Senate Election Cases, supra, page 284, and subsequent pages. The debates on this question will be found in the Congressional Globe, part 1, Thirty-seventh Congress, pages 696–697; also part 2, second session, same Congress, pages 988–994; also Congressional Globe, part 3, same Congress, page 2596.

The committee made a report on April 22, 1862, in which is found:

"First. That for many months prior to the 21st November, 1861, and up to that time the said Stark was an ardent advocate of the cause of the rebellious States.

"Second. That after the formation of the constitution of the Confederate States he openly declared his admiration for it and advocated the absorption of the loyal States of the Union into the Southern Confederacy under that constitution as the only means of peace, warmly avowing his sympathies with the South.

"Third. That the Senator from Oregon is disloyal to the Government of the United States."

A portion of the testimony upon which the committee based its findings is summarized in the report, as follows:

"In coming to the foregoing conclusion the committee cheerfully agree to the statement of the Senator in his answer, that 'as a Senator of the United States for the State of Oregon, I am entitled to and I claim every presumption of honor, integrity, loyalty, and patriotism that can be claimed by any other Senator until such presumption is overborne by competent testimony'; and they cheerfully accord to him all the force and benefit of such a presumption; at the same time they are forced, with pain and reluctance, to find such presumption overborne by the array of witnesses which testify in regard to his conduct and declarations. Thirteen witnesses, who are not only unimpeachable but are among the most respectable people of the city of Portland, where Mr. Stark resides, testify to the truth of the first of the foregoing propositions."

The report then sets out the names of the witnesses and, after some discussion of the testimony, proceeds:

"Although in his (Senator Stark's) communication to the Committee on the Judiciary, dated the 17th January, 1862, the Senator from Oregon declared 'that in a forum competent to try and determine the issue he should be able to prove the allegations against his loyalty to be utterly unfounded, and that in many important particulars the declarations of his assailants were false'; yet when an opportunity has been given to the Senator, upon his own motion, to send for persons and papers to disprove these allegations before a committee legally, if not otherwise competent, the Senator does not desire these witnesses to be put under oath nor to be reexamined nor cross-examined; nor does he offer any rebutting testimony or express a wish that any should be taken; nor does he, in his statement filed before the committee, so far as the committee remember, attempt to deny or impeach it—for while he says that the statements of Hull and Law are especially false, he makes no such allegation against these 13 witnesses or any one of them. He objects to no one of these witnesses because his statement was not made under oath.

"These witnesses, however, do not stand alone, nor does the finding of the committee on this proposition rest solely upon testimony given without the sanctity of an oath.

"Wesley C. Hull, upon oath, on the 18th November, 1861, says that, in the month of February previous, he heard Mr. Stark make use of the following language: 'If there is to be any war between the North and the South, all my property is for sale at 50 cents on the dollar, and I will go and help the South fight. The Palmetto flag is my flag; the Southern Confederacy is the only legal government in existence; that the United States Government is broken up; that Jeff. Davis is fighting in a good cause, and it will be impossible to defeat him'; that afterwards, upon another occasion, he heard the said Stark use the following language: 'The United States forces may fight the South from one end of their Government to the other, but it will amount to nothing; they will close up behind them, and they can not be conquered. The South is fighting in a good cause, for government and order, and they can not be conquered.'

"Henry Law, also on oath, says that he is acquainted with Mr. Stark; that as early as December, 1860, he heard Mr. Stark say he did not go one cent on the Star and Stripes; that the Palmetto flag was his flag, and if there was any issue between the North and South he would sell all his property and go South.

"A. M. Starr, also under oath, on the 20th November, 1861, declared that within the then last two weeks past he had heard Mr. Stark say that there was no United States Government; and also he heard Mr. Stark say, when the President first called for volunteers, 'that the United States Government could not support an army of 30,000 in the field for six months; that the people of the loyal States would not back up the administration in trying to put down this rebellion.'

"Thirty other witnesses, likewise under oath, say, on the 15th November, 1861, 'that Mr. Stark is well known and generally reputed to be an open and avowed friend to the Southern Confederacy as against the Union.'"

Other testimony was taken to the same effect and all substantially undisputed. A letter written by Senator Clark, in June, 1861, was also introduced, avowing substantially the same sentiments ascribed to him by the witnesses. In this letter he said:

"'Civil war can not avert disunion'; 'Subjugation can not prolong the Union'; 'To subjugate the South, were that possible, would be the establishment of a military despotism.'"

Upon the report of the committee, Senator Sumner introduced the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Benjamin Stark, a Senator from Oregon, who has been found by a committee of this body to be disloyal to the Government of the United States be, and the same is hereby, expelled from the Senate."

The Senate, however, by a vote of 16 for expulsion to 21 against, declined to agree to Senator Sumner's motion. (Cong. Globe, 37th Cong., pt. 3, p. 2596.)

e. The case of Jesse D. Bright.

Jesse D. Bright, Senator from Indiana, was expelled from the Senate in March, 1862, by a vote of 32 to 14. The case is reported in compilation of Senate election cases, supra, page 1200; Hinds' Precedents, volume 2, page 824, See for the debates, Congressional Globe, part 1, volume 3, second session Thirty-seventh Congress, page 89, and particularly pages 287, 391, 396, 413, 651, and subsequent pages.

The charge against Senator Bright was that of disloyalty and rendering aid to the rebel cause. It was based on the following letter, the authorship of which he admitted:

"WASHINGTON, March 1, 1861.

"MY DEAR SIR: Allow me to introduce to your acquaintance my friend, Thomas B. Lincoln, of Texas. He visits your capital mainly to dispose of what he regards a great improvement in firearms. I commend him to your favorable consideration as a gentleman of the first respectability, and reliable in every respect.

"Yours, very truly, JESSE D. BRIGHT.

"President of the Confederation of States."

When the foregoing letter became public, as it did through the arrest for treason of its bearer, Thomas B. Lincoln, Senator Bright, on September 7, 1861, wrote a second letter to J. Fitch, a friend at Madison, Ind., in which he sought to excuse or explain away the letter of March 1, 1861. In this second letter he said:

"No man regrets more than I the present condition of public affairs, or is more anxious to see peace, unity, and fraternity restored. I do not think the policy of that party is calculated to produce such results; so far from it, the inevitable tendency of its measures, in my opinion, is to render the disruption permanent and incurable. And hence I have opposed, and so long as my personal convictions last shall continue to oppose, the entire coercive policy of the Government."

The movement to expel Senator Bright was led by Senator Trumbull, of Illinois, and Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts. Senator Bayard, of Delaware, and others opposed the expulsion. It is noticeable, however, that there was no dispute and practically little difference between the Senators concerning the principle which should be applied. The constitution of the Confederate States was adopted and Jefferson Davis elected President early in February, 1861 The question at issue was whether the letter of March 1 constituted an overt act and amounted to the giving of aid to the rebel government.

On this subject Senator Trumbull said (p. 395, Cong. Globe, vol. 1, 2d sess., 37th Cong.):

"On the 1st day of March, when the letter in question was written by the honorable Senator, this country was involved in a state of civil war Mr Davis, on the 21st of January, left his seat in this Senate to inaugurate civil war, with the open and avowed purpose of dissevering his connection with this Government and inaugurating a state of facts in the Southern Confederacy which should dismember this Union, and on the 1st of March he was known to the world, and must, of course, have been known to the honorable Senator from Indiana, to be engaged in the purpose of overthrowing the authority of this Government in one-half of its jurisdiction. Then, sir, according to the law of nations, he was a traitor to his Government, and upon any fair exposition of law might have been convicted of treason and have been executed for treason.

"What was the condition of the honorable Senator from Indiana? He was a member of this Government, sworn to maintain this Government against all attempts to overthrow it either by foreign or domestic enemies. That was his duty. To aid, to countenance Jefferson Davis in his purpose to overthrow this Government was what? Treason, of course. Any citizen of the United States who should lend to him encouragement in carrying on the war which he had begun would be guilty of treason as a matter of course; * * *.

"In the light of this principle—let us look at this letter and see what it proves. * * * You will perceive, first, that it is addressed to 'his excellency Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederation of States,' etc., and that of course, is an official recognition of his character. He recognizes him in the effort he is making to maintain an independent government within the jurisdiction and limits of the United States as legitimate, addresses him as if he acknowledges the success of his efforts and his attempts to establish such government. * * * And more, Mr. President, it is not only the language of friendships but it is the language of a courtier—'he visits your capital.' Not only does he recognize this usurper as a legitimate sovereign and head of a legitimate government, but he addresses him in the language of friendship and in court phrase—'your capital'—and he commends his friend to his favor. * * * Now, look at this letter. It is a letter of introduction to Mr. Davis in favor of the Senator's friend, Mr. Lincoln; and what was Mr. Lincoln to do? He was about to leave this capital of the United States to repair to the capital of Mr. Davis, who was in arms against his Government, to engage with him. His mission, therefore, was a mission of treason. The first step he made in advance was an overt act of treason. The honorable Senator knew that Mr. Davis was a traitor engaged in levying war. He knew that it was the purpose of this man Lincoln to join him and to aid him in his nefarious work in overthrowing this Government. He knew that, and he encouraged him to go and join Mr. Davis, giving him an introduction, a passport to Mr. Davis, and by using his great personal influence with his old friend to give him employment. I repeat, the mission of Lincoln was a mission of treason. The honorable Senator knew it He was bound there for the purpose of giving Davis aid and comfort and to enlist in his services; nay, more, sir, not only to enlist in his service but to furnish him above all things what he needed—arms. He commends him, if you will recur to the language, as a man who desires to 'dispose of what he regards as a great improvement in firearms.'"

Referring to the Bright case in subsequently discussing the Powell case (see Cong. Globe, pt. 2, 2d sess., 37th Cong., p. 1254), Senator Trumbull said:

"I do not propose to argue the case of the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Indiana was guilty of an overt act. He corresponded with traitors. He addressed them as a government. He recommended to them a man with arms."

This was the view that finally prevailed with the Senate. But it is to be noted that Senator Trumbull, as well as Senator Sumner and the other Senators, were careful to say that so far as the second letter was concerned, while it manifested intense hostility to the Government in its efforts to suppress the rebellion, it afforded no basis for any action by the Senate.

Senator Trumbull said (see Cong. Globe, pt. 1, 2d sess., 37th Cong., p. 397):

"I tolerate the freest expression of opinion. I agree that any Senator may disapprove the acts of the administration, may disapprove the policy that is pursued to put down this rebellion; but when any Senator, or anybody else, does an act in favor of the men in arms against this Government, then I say he is giving aid and comfort to the enemy, and he becomes criminally culpable."

Referring to the second letter, Senator Sumner said (see Cong. Globe, supra, p. 415):

"I do not dwell on other topics of this second letter, because, though exhibiting bad temper and bad principles, they do not necessarily conduce to treason. The writer is welcome to express his 'utter contempt for abolitionism' and also to declare his early and constant opposition to what he calls 'the entire coercive policy of the Government.' Such declarations may render him an unsafe counselor, but they do not stamp him as a traitor. And it belongs to us, while urging this body of disloyalty in all its forms, to maintain at all hazards that freedom of speech which is the herald and safeguard of all other freedom."

When it is remembered that the second letter was written long after hostilities between the North and the South had actually begun, and "the coercive policy of the Government included all measures taken by the Government to put down the rebellion," it is apparent that even in the days of the fiercest passions of the Civil War the Senate never thought itself empowered to inquire into the utterances and acts of any Senator, except those involving some overt act of hostility to the Government.

The principles upon which the Senate proceeded, and concerning which there was substantial agreement, were stated by Senator Bayard, as follows (see Cong. Globe, vol. 1, supra, pp. 647, 648):

"The action of the Senate in all cases of expulsion must of necessity be judicial. I freely admit that by the terms of the Constitution the power of expulsion is absolute in two-thirds of the Members present constituting a quorum and that there is no restriction on the power expressed and no specification of the grounds on which expulsion must be based. It is none the less judicial action. It is the punishment of an individual by deprivation of an office which he is entitled to hold unless criminal misconduct is proved against him. You may expel by the mere two-thirds vote of the Senate without any cause whatever, but that would not be the rightful exercise but a gross and tyrannical abuse of power. The punishment of an individual for misconduct in any mode, whether by deprivation of office or otherwise, in all free countries must necessarily be a judicial question, whatever may be the forum or the body in which the decision is to be made. The forms of proceeding in courts of justice may be dispensed with; the mere model rules of evidence may not be essential, but the great leading principles of evidence in all judicial trials can not be abandoned without palpable injustice where punishment is to follow the sentence of any tribunal. I care not whether you call the offense charged criminal misconduct or a misdemeanor; there must be an alleged charge proved according to rational inference from the facts adduced in the case or else injustice must be done. Difference of opinion, however wide, no matter how exciting or grave a subject on which that difference exists, will not justify an expulsion, unless, indeed, the doctrine is to obtain that a political party, having a two-thirds majority in this Chamber, can rightfully crush all opposition to its general policy or its particular measure by this power of expulsion. In my judgment, such can never be a rational construction of the constitution of a free representative government, be that government a monarchy or a republic.

"Sir, the precedents are in accordance with this. In Blount's case the judgment of the Senate was nearly unanimous. It was on criminal misconduct charged and proved in this case.

"In Smith's case the charge also was for participation in a conspiracy to destroy the United States or to subvert its Government as to a portion of its territory. Not sympathy with Mr. Burr, nor intimacy with Mr. Burr but participation in his conspiracy was the charge in the resolution for the expulsion of Smith, on which the vote of the Senate was taken, but which failed on the yeas and nays by one vote.

"In both those cases the Senate allowed counsel to the accused, but he was charged with a distinct and specific act of criminal misconduct. It matters not whether the conduct of Blount amounted to a misdemeanor which could be reached by the statute law of the land, it was criminal misconduct proved in the case; and the action of the Senate was judicial. In the case of Smith it was not only criminal misconduct, but if true and proved, it was a crime under the statute law, and could also have been punished by the sentence of a court. Of the jurisdiction of the Senate in both these cases or in this I have no doubt. But, unless the action was intended to be judicial, it is impossible to suppose that the Senate on those resolutions for expulsion would have allowed counsel to be heard in defense of the accused. The whole course of the proceedings was also of a judicial character."

f. The case of Lazarus W. Powell.

The above case, the last I shall consider, and the last of the great Senate expulsion cases growing out of the Civil War, is instructive. It is reported in Hinds' Precedents, vol. 2, p. 827; Compilation of Senate Election Cases, supra, p. 1205; Congressional Globe, second session, Thirty-seventh Congress, pt. 2, pp. 1208–1234.

On February 20, 1862, a resolution was introduced in the Senate to expel Senator Powell, of Kentucky, based on the grounds among others that after the Confederacy had been formed and made war upon the United States he had presided at a convention in Kentucky and supported resolutions providing:

"2. That the war being now waged by the Federal Administration against the Southern States is in violation of the Constitution and laws, and has already been attended with such stupendous usurpations as to amaze the world and endanger every safeguard of constitutional liberty * * *

"That the recall of the invading armies and the recognition of the separate independence of the Confederate States is the true policy to restore peace and preserve the relations of fraternal love and amity between the States. * * *

"6. That we heartily approve the refusal of Gov. Magoffin to furnish Kentucky troops to subjugate the South; and we cordially indorse his recent proclamation defining the position of Kentucky, in accordance with the sentiment of her people, and forbidding the invasion of Kentucky by Federal or Confederate troops.

"7. That although Kentucky has determined that her proper position at present is that of strict neutrality between the belligerent sections, yet, if either of them invade her soil against her will, she ought to resent and repel it by necessary force."

Senator Powell's course in the Senate had also been one of consistent opposition to the war and all the war measures. Speaking on the revenue bill when it was up for passage on the 2d of August, 1861, he said (see Cong. Globe, pt. 2, 2d sess., 37th Cong., p. 1212):

"I have steadily voted against all appropriations to carry on this war I voted against the loan bill, and I have steadily voted against all war supplies. I cast those votes because I was opposed to the war; because I believe the war was calculated to eternally sever the States of this Union, and that it would result in no good, but manifest evil to every interest of the entire country. Having cast the votes I have, I can not conscientiously vote for this bill. I knew that the heavy amount of war supplies that were being voted by Congress would necessarily result in the most onerous taxation of the people. Those gentlemen who voted for those war measures, I suppose, can conscientiously vote for this bill; for the votes which they have given lead directly to it. Those who vote for war measures and war loans can properly vote for the taxes to raise the money to pay the debt. I have opposed the war having voted against the loan, having voted against the Army supplies, deem it my duty to vote against the bill, which I shall do."

Yet only 11 votes could be mustered in support of the resolution for his expulsion, while 28 votes were cast against the resolution.

2. The law of free speech.

From the time that the people demanded and secured the first amendment to the Constitution as a condition of ratification of that document there has been little controversy until the present time respecting freedom of speech and of the press. When the people wrote into the Constitution the first amendment providing that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances," they naturally felt from the language used that, so far as the Federal Government was concerned, the last word had been said on the subject. Until very recently it has been generally assumed that the Constitution meant what it said. So true is this that the Supreme Court of the United States has never had occasion directly to construe the free-speech clause of the Constitution.

In the case of Reynolds v. United States (98 U. S., 163) the Supreme Court approved the doctrine of the Virginia resolution of 1786, which provided:

"To suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles on supposition of their ill tendency is a dangerous fallacy which at once destroys all liberty, because he, being, of course, judge of that tendency, will make his opinions the rule of judgment and approve or condemn the sentiments of others only as they shall square with or differ from his own. It is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order."

There appear to have been more decisions by the Federal courts of this country upon the free-speech clause of the Constitution during the past year than in all the 130 years preceding since the Constitution was adopted. The reason, of course, is that during the past year the right of the people to peaceably assemble and discuss public questions has been challenged as never before. That the Federal courts have, in the main, when the question has been presented, adhered to the ancient principles of a free press and free speech is both encouraging and reassuring. I shall take the space only to refer to a few of these cases.

These examples of the exercise of the right to criticize and denounce the Government cited under this and the next following subdivision of this brief are placed before you simply in order to show how very far anything Senator LA FOLLETTE is charged with saying comes from being objectionable under the decisions of the courts or the practice of the statesmen of this country. With the propriety or impropriety, wisdom or unwisdom, of such speeches and publications I have nothing to do.

The first case decided, I believe, on this subject since the war began was that of the United States v. Baker and Wilhide, in the United States District Court for the District of Maryland, decided on July 11, 1917, by Judge Rose, admittedly, I think, among the ablest district judges in the country. The charge against the defendants in that case was that of distributing literature and making speeches calculated to obstruct the operation of the draft law and discourage enlistments. The defendants were Socialists. The literature distributed was extremely violent in its denunciation of the war and the conscription law. One of the pamphlets, distributed at a public meeting called to promote enlistments, and entitled "The Price We Pay," contained, among other things, the following:

"Conscription is upon us; the draft law is a fact!

"Into your homes the recruiting officers are coming. They will take your sons of military age and impress them into the Army.

"Stand them up in long rows, break them into squads and platoons, teach them to deploy and wheel.

"Guns will be put into their hands; they will be taught not to think, only to obey without questioning.

"Then they will be shipped through the submarine zone by the hundreds of thousands to the bloody quagmire of Europe.

"Into that seething, heaving swamp of torn flesh and floating entrails they will be plunged, in regiments, divisions, and armies, screaming as they go. * * *

"Yesterday I saw moving pictures of the battle of the Somme. * * * *

"The hospital camps were shown, with hundreds and thousands of wounded men in all stages of pain and suffering, herded like animals, milling round like cattle in the slaughter pens.

"All the horror and agony of war were exhibited, and at the end a flag was thrown on the screen and a proclamation said:

"'Enlist for your country!' The applause was very thin and scattering, and as we went out most of the men shook their heads and said:

"'That's a hell of a poor recruiting scheme!' * * *

"It is the price you pay—you have rejected socialism. * * *

"This war, you say, is all caused by the Kaiser, and we are fighting for democracy against autocracy. Once dethrone the Kaiser and there will be permanent peace.

"That is what they said about Napoleon. And in the century since Napoleon was overthrown there have been more and greater wars than the world ever saw before.

"There were wars before Germany existed; before Rome ruled; before Egypt dominated the ages.

"War has been universal, and the cause of war is always the same. Somebody wanted something somebody else possessed, and they fought over the ownership of it.

"This war began over commercial routes and ports and rights, and underneath all the talk about democracy versus autocracy you hear a continual note, an undercurrent, a subdued refrain: 'Get ready for the commercial war that will follow this war.'

"Commercial war preceded this war; it gave rise to this war; it now gives point and meaning to this war.

"And as soon as the guns are stilled and the dead are buried commercial forces will prepare for the next bloody struggle over routes and ports and rights, coal mines, and railroads.

"For these are the essence of this as of all other wars!

"This, you say, is a war for the rights of small nations, and the first land sighted when you sail across the Atlantic is the nation of Ireland, which has suffered from England for three centuries more than what Germany has inflicted upon Belgium for three years.

"But go to it! Believe everything you are told—you always have, and doubtless always will, believe them.

"Only do retain this much reason: When you have paid the price, the last and uttermost price, and have not received what you were told you were fighting for, namely, democracy—

"Then remember that the price you paid was not the purchase price for justice, but the penalty price for your stupidity!"

Judge Ross, addressing the counsel and the jury before taking any testimony, said that he desired at the outset to make it clear what the issue was to be tried. Among other things, he said:

"Any man has a perfect right to any opinion he may see fit to form about any law that is proposed or about any law that is on the statute books. Any man may do anything, in itself legal, to secure the repeal of any law that is on the statute books. To that end he may make any argument that commends itself to his reason and judgment against the policy of any particular law, whether it be the law for selective draft or any other. And he is not answerable for the wisdom of his argument. He could not very well be so answerable and put on trial even for the good faith of some of them. I am afraid, if he could be, that most of the political orators in every campaign would be put on trial for the good faith of what they said about the other party."

And as the judge pointed out, there was one limit, and only one limit, and that was that one might not argue that a law should be violated, even though it was done under the pretense of arguing for the law's repeal. The sole question, as pointed out in various forms, was whether the defendants in anything that they did or said intended to persuade men to violate the law. And after the testimony was in, the court, in directing the jury to find a verdict of not guilty, said:

"You may have your own opinions about that circular; I have very strong individual opinions about it and as to the wisdom and fairness of what is said there, but so far as I can see it is principally a circular intended to get people to subscribe to some newspaper and to get recruits for the Socialist Party. I do not think that we ought to attempt to prosecute people for that kind of thing. It may be unwise in its effect, and it may be unpatriotic at that particular time and place, but it would be going very far, indeed, farther, I think, than any law I know of would justify, to hold that there has been made out any case here that there was an attempt to persuade men not to obey the law."

I have the certified copy of the opinion and indictment and one of the circulars, and shall be glad to submit same for examination if desired.

Judge Clarence W. Sessions, of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, in the recent case of the United States v. Freeman, tried at Grand Rapids, Mich, October 19, 1917, set forth the same rule as that declared by Judge Rose. In that case it was charged that not only was the same pamphlet, "The Price We Pay," used to discourage enlistments, but also another one entitled "Proclamation and War Program," and the Socialist platform as well, which demands "continuous active and public opposition to the war." The evidence in the case was deemed sufficient to present some question of fact as to the intent. But in his charge to the jury Judge Sessions said:

"The distribution of literature here involved in itself and considered by itself is not unlawful. * * *

"Every citizen of the United States has a legal right to have and to express an opinion against the approval of any proposed or pending legislation, and to have and express an opinion favoring the repeal or modification of any law after it has been approved and adopted.

"Every citizen has the right to have and express any opinion opposed to the principle of conscription, either before or after the enactment of the selective draft or conscription act approved on the 18th day of last May.

"During April, May, and June of this year, and hence during the period covered by this indictment, every citizen had the right to criticize the Government and its policies, including the Government's declaration of war against Germany. He had a right to oppose conscription as a governmental policy. He had a right to use all lawful means and efforts, either in connection with a political party or as an individual, to secure the repeal of the conscription law or to assist in protesting against the continued existence of such law."

The latest pronouncement of the courts upon the subject, and probably the clearest and most complete, is that contained in the charge of Judge Augustus N. Hand to the jury in the case of United States v. Eastman et al., in the southern district of New York, delivered on April 25, 1918. I have procured the entire charge from the official reporter, which I will be glad to submit to the committee. I call particular attention to the following portions of the charge, which are unmodified by anything else in it, and which ably and correctly state the rule of law applicable alike to the humblest citizen and highest official in the land:

"I do not have to remind you that every man has the right to have such economic, philosophic, or religious opinions as seem to him best, whether they be socialistic, anarchistic, or atheistic, and that you should divorce yourselves from any prejudice you may have against any defendant by reason of proof of any such opinions on his part.

"Each defendant has the constitutional right of freedom of speech also, unless he violates the express law which he is accused of violating, no matter how ill timed, unsuited to your sense of propriety, or morally wrong his opinion, utterances, or writings may be. * * *

"Every citizen has a right, without intent to obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service, to think, feel, and express disapproval or abhorrence of any law or policy, or proposed law or policy, including the declaration of war, the conscription act, and the so-called sedition clauses of the espionage act; belief that the war is not, or was not, a war for democracy; belief that our participation in it was forced or induced by powers with selfish interests to be served thereby; belief that our participation was against the will of the majority of the citizens or voters of the country; belief that the self-sacrifice of persons who elect to suffer for freedom of conscience is admirable; belief that war is horrible; belief that the allies' war aims were or are selfish and undemocratic; belief that the Hon. Elihu Root is hostile to socialism and that his selection to represent America in a socialistic republic was ill advised.

"It is the constitutional right of every citizen to express his opinion about the war or the participation of the United States in it, about the desirability of peace, about the merits or demerits of the system of conscription, and about the moral rights or claims of conscientious objectors to be exempt from conscription.

"It is the constitutional right of the citizen to express such opinions, even though they are opposed to the opinions or policies of the administration and even though the expression of such opinions may unintentionally or indirectly discourage recruiting and enlistment."

These are the rights jealously defended and freely exercised by the great statesmen and devoted patriots of this country from the beginning of the Government down to the present hour.

At the risk of repeating what is already familiar to all members of the committee, I have ventured to bring together at this point some quotations from the great speeches of the leading men of our country made during times of great national stress and peril, to show how freely those rights have been asserted at such times.

3. Free speech as practiced in war times.

a. Of the Civil War.

As I have previously shown in discussing the precedents, it was freely conceded during the Civil War, as stated even by Senator Trumbull and Senator Sumner, that freedom of discussion must be maintained even in the midst of war, and that the right could not be challenged to disapprove the acts of the administration in power and even the policies pursued to put down the rebellion. It will be recalled that the national Democratic Party adopted a plank in 1864 strongly condemning the war. In its platform adopted in Chicago August 29, 1864, upon which George B. McClellan was nominated for President, it declared that—

"Justice, humanity, liberty, and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities, with a view to the ultimate convention of the States, or other peaceable means, to the end that at the earliest practicable moment peace may be restored on the basis of the Federal Union of the States."

Also—

"That the direct interference of the military authorities of the United States in the recent elections held in Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and Delaware was a shameful violation of the Constitution, and a repetition of such acts in the approaching election will be held as revolutionary and resisted with all the means and power under our control."

b. The Mexican War.

During the Mexican War the acts of the Government in prosecuting the war and the policy of the Government in declaring it were mercilessly condemned by men whose patriotism and devotion to their country's interest no one would think of questioning. It was a favorite device in that war, as it has been in all wars, for the war party to assert that anyone who opposed the declaration of war or any policy of the Government concerning the war was prolonging it, and for that reason was guilty of reprehensible conduct. It has remained, however, for the members of the various so-called defense committees and public-safety commissions of the present time to brand as treason and disloyalty all expressions of opinion in opposition to the war purpose or program of the administration. The most charitable thing that can be said of such men is that their zeal has far outrun their intelligence. Mr. Lincoln evidently did not feel that condemnation of the wisdom as well as the integrity of the administration during the Mexican War involved disloyalty or impropriety on his part. In the midst of the war and on January 12, 1848, in the House of Representatives, Mr. Lincoln bitterly assailed the whole war program of the President. Among other things, he said:

"Some, if not all, the gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have addressed the committee within the last two days, have spoken rather complainingly, if I have rightly understood them, of the vote given a week or 10 days ago, declaring that the war with Mexico was unnecessarily and unconstitutionally commenced by the President. I admit that such a vote should not be given in mere party wantonness, and that the one given is justly censurable, if it have no other or better foundation. I am one of those who joined in that vote; but I did so under my best impression of the truth of the case. How I got this impression, and how it may possibly be removed, I will now try to show. * * *

"Then he (the President) suggests the propriety of wheedling the Mexican people to desert the counsels of their own leaders and trust in our protection to set up a government from which we can secure a satisfactory peace, telling us that 'this may become the only mode of obtaining such a peace.' But soon he falls into doubt of this, too, and then drops back onto the already half-abandoned ground of 'more vigorous prosecution.' All this shows that the President is in nowise satisfied with his own positions. First he takes up one position, and in attempting to argue us into it he argues himself out of it; then seizes another and goes through the same process; and then, confused at being able to think of nothing new, he snatches up the old one again which he has some time before cast off. His mind, tasked beyond its power, is running hither and thither like some tortured creature on a burning surface, finding no position on which it can settle down and be at ease.

"Again, it is a singular omission in this message that it nowhere intimates when the President expects the war to terminate. At its beginning Gen. Scott was by this same President driven into disfavor, if not disgrace, for intimating that peace could not be conquered in less than three or four months. But now, at the end of about 20 months, during which our arms have given us the most splendid successes, every department and every part, land and water, officers and privates, Regulars and Volunteers, doing all that men could do and hundreds of things which it had ever before been thought men could not do; after all this this same President gives us a long message without showing us that, as to the end, he has himself even an imaginary conception. As I have before said, he knows not where he is. He is a bewildered, confounded, and miserably perplexed man. God grant he may be able to show there is not something about his conscience more plainful than al' his mental perplexity." (See Cong. Globe Appendix, 30th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 93–95.)

On January 2, 1848, Mr. Ashmum, of Massachusetts, in the House of Representatives, offered his amendment to the Houston resolution of thanks to Gen. Taylor. This amendment inserted in the resolution of thanks the words that the Mexican War was "unnecessarily and unconstitutionally begun by the President of the United States." The Ashmum amendment was adopted by a vote of 85 to 81, Mr. Lincoln voting with the majority. (See Cong. Globe, 30th Cong., 1st sess., p. 95.) A subsequent motion to expunge the amendment was lost by even a larger vote. It is to be recalled that Mr. Ashmum was made chairman of the Republican convention which met in Chicago and nominated Mr. Lincoln for the presidency on May 18, 1860.

Alexander H. Stevens, of Georgia, in a speech on February 15, 1847, while the Mexican War was at its height, said:

"The President has more than once told us that the war is not waged for conquest. Is there a friend of his on this floor who supposes that anybody familiar with the unparalleled duplicity of his administration will do the President the injustice to believe him. Every act of his toward Mexico before the war began and since the war began displays his policy too clearly to be mistaken." (See McMaster's History of the United States, p. 477; also Cong. Globe, 29th Cong., 2d sess., p. 401.)

It will be remembered that Congress was far more united in its declaration of the war against Mexico than it was in declaring the present war. There were but two votes in the Senate against the declaration of war, Clayton of Delaware and Davis of Kentucky. Senators Berrien, Calhoun, and Evans, being in their seats, did not vote. (See Cong. Globe, p. 804, 1st sess., 29th Cong.) There were 12 votes against the declaration of war in the House of Representatives. (See Cong. Globe, 29th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 3, p. 797, also p. 824.)

The President, in his annual message to Congress, December, 1846, took occasion to justify the declaration of war against Mexico which he had obtained from Congress on May 13, 1846, at its previous session, and pointed out the number of lawless acts perpetrated upon the property and persons of our citizens by Mexico and of wanton insults to our national flag. Of those who opposed the war the President said:

"The war has been represented as unjust and unnecessary, and as one of aggression on our part upon a weak and injured enemy. Such erroneous views, though entertained by but few, have been widely and extensively circulated, not only at home but have been spread throughout Mexico and the whole world. A more effectual means could not have been devised to encourage the enemy to adhere to their cause and thus give them aid and comfort." (See Cong. Globe, 29th Cong., 2d sess., p. 4.)

Charles H. Hudson, of Massachusetts, speaking in the House of Representatives, referring to the above-mentioned portion of the President's speech, said:

"I look with equal indifference upon the denunciations of the President and of his flatterers on this floor. I will speak my sentiments here or elsewhere, and I will speak them fully. If I believe the Executive is wrong in any of his measures, I will make the declaration. If I believe he has usurped power and trampled upon the Constitution of the United States, none of the denunciations or sarcasms of gentlemen on this floor will deter me from giving a full expression of these my views and feelings. Nothing, I say, that the President can say or do will deter me in any degree from a full and fair expression of my own opinions. Has it come to this, Mr. Chairman, that a President can arrogate to himself the war-making power, can trample the Constitution under foot, and wantonly involve the Nation in war, and the people must submit to this atrocity and justify him in his course or be branded as traitors to their country? Why, sir, if this doctrine prevails, the more corrupt the administration is, if it has the power or the daring to involve this Nation in a war without cause, the greater is its impunity, for the moment it has succeeded in committing that outrage every mouth must be closed and everyone must bow in submission. A doctrine more corrupt was never advanced; a sentiment more dastardly was never advocated in a deliberative assembly. Gentlemen who profess to be peculiar friends of popular rights may advance doctrines of this character, and they may be in perfect accordance with their views and feelings and in conformity with their democracy; but I have too much of the spirit which characterized our fathers to submit to dictation from any source whatsoever, whether it be foreign monarch or an American President.

"I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the first principal declaration contained in the message of the President—that the war exists by the act of Mexico and that we have taken all honorable means to prevent it—to be an untruth. * * *

"The message, Mr. Chairman, declares that the existing war with Mexico was neither desired nor provoked by the United States; on the contrary, all honorable means were resorted to to avert it! This declaration I believe to be absolutely untrue." (See CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE, Appendix, 29th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 49–59.)

The above quotations from Mr. Hudson are but typical of what was said freely in Congress and out of Congress and published freely in newspapers throughout the country. Indeed it appears that books and pamphlets of quotations from leading newspapers of the United States condemning the war policy of our Government were made up in Mexico and circulated among the people of Mexico to arouse them to oppose the invasion of American troops. (See CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE, Appendix, 1st sess., 30th Cong., p. 436.)

Joshua A. Giddings, of Ohio, in a memorable speech on the Mexican War, December 14, 1846, said:

"When the Members of the House met in this place two years ago the country was at peace, at profound peace, with all the world. Industry received its legitimate reward, agriculture and maintenance were flourishing and general prosperity was spread over the land. Then a great and sudden change came over our public policy; the party in power was seized with an inordinate desire to extend our territorial possessions, and thus, in the cant language of the day, 'to enlarge the area of freedom.' The party in opposition opposed it to the extent of their ability. Thus the two parties stood, on this great question, directly opposed to each other. But the extension policy prevailed, and in two short years a great and important change took place in our whole policy and condition. A foreign war of conquest now existed; the Nation was involved by it in a vast expenditure and in the guilt of deepest crimes. The people were called on to pour out their treasure and their blood upon a foreign soil. The result was just such as had been foreseen and distinctly foretold. * * *

"Mr. G. said he was aware that an idea was extensively indulged that whenever our country was engaged in war, be it just or unjust, every true-hearted American was bound to support it with all his power. He denied it utterly. For the present he would content himself with referring to the fact that the whole country were putting to each other the question, For what is our Army sent into the territory of a sister Republic and we taxed to carry devastation and bloodshed into the heart of a foreign country? What benefit is to result to us; what good to the world of mankind? These questions demanded an answer. The President had presented his plea of self-defense, but had left the question unanswered." (Cong. Globe, 29th Cong., 2d sess., p. 34.)

Mr. Calhoun made a memorable speech in the Senate of the United States on the Mexican War on February 24, 1847. At that time the war had been in progress for many months, and the military operations were proceeding rapidly. Mr. Calhoun had shown himself to be patriotic rather than partisan in opposing the war. Moved by a high sense of duty, he had determined to oppose the war, even though it cut him off from his former political associations and thwarted whatever political ambition he might possess. In the speech above referred to, among other things, he said:

"Every Senator knows that I was opposed to the war, but none knows but myself the depth of that opposition. With my conceptions of its character and consequences, it was impossible for me to vote for it. When, accordingly, I was deserted by every friend on this side of the House, including my then honorable colleague among the rest [Mr. McDuffie], I was not shaken in the least degree in reference to my course. On the passage of the act recognizing the war I said to many of my friends that a deed had been done from which the country would not be able to recover for a long time, if ever; and added, it has dropped a curtain between the present and the future, which to me is impenetrable; and for the first time since I have been in public life I am unable to see the future. I also added that it has closed the first volume of our political history under the Constitution, and opened the second, and that no mortal could tell what would be written in it. These deep impressions were made upon my mind because I saw, from the circumstances under which the war was made, a total departure from that course of policy which had governed the country from the commencement of our Government until that time; and that, too, under circumstances calculated to lead to most disastrous consequences. Since then less than a year has elapsed, but in that short period enough has already been developed to make what was then said look like prophecy." (See Cong. Globe, Appendix, 29th Cong., 2d sess., p. 500.)

History has fully vindicated the prophetic judgment of Mr. Calhoun. Whatever possibility of peaceable settlement of the slavery question previously existed were destroyed by the annexation of Texas and by the conquests of the Mexican War. It has been said that the Civil War was the awful price we paid for the unjust war provoked with Mexico. Be that as it may, it is certain that the events of the Mexican War and the conditions growing out of it led on naturally to the Civil War. If so minor an event, comparatively speaking, as the declaration of war against Mexico might properly raise forebodings in the mind of Mr. Calhoun and others, what must have been the possibilities of danger to our country which presented themselves to the minds of the statesmen of the present day when the result of our entry into this war were considered. Is a Senator disloyal because he was unwilling to take the responsibility of voting for the declaration of war, with all its awful consequences, or because, since war has been declared, he is anxious to find some honorable and just means of escaping from it before this country is reduced, possibly, to the condition of the warring nations of Europe? Whatever may be the thought of the wisdom or unwisdom of those who believe the war could have been avoided or still believe that some peace is possible short of the annihilation of one or the other set of warring nations, it is certain that they are entitled to their opinions and are entitled to express them.

It can not be successfully claimed that the foregoing speeches were made under the protection of the privilege of the Senate or House of Representatives, for the speeches were widely published, and, moreover, equally strong condemnation of the administration was made in speeches outside the Congress and appeared in many newspapers throughout the country.

Charles Sumner, in a speech at Tremont Temple, Boston, November 5, 1846, said:

"The Mexican War is an enormity born of slavery. * * * Base in object, atrocious in beginning, immoral in all its influences, vainly prodigal of treasure and life, it is a war of infamy which must blot the pages of our history."

Mr. Webster, at Faneuil Hall, on November 6, 1846, speaking of the Mexican War, said:

"Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak with all soberness in this respect, and I would say nothing here to-night which I would not say in my place in Congress or before the whole world. The question now is, For what purposes and to what ends is this present war to be prosecuted? * * * It is time for us to know what are the objects and designs of our Government. * * * We are, in my opinion, in a most unnecessary and therefore a most unjustiable war."

Henry Clay, in a memorable address at Lexington, Ky., on the 30th day of November, 1847, answered completely and in his masterly manner the arguments sometimes heard to-day that being in war all power must be given to the President. Among other things, he said:

"Either Congress or the President must have the right of determining upon the objects for which a war shall be prosecuted. There is no other alternative. If the President possess it and may prosecute it for objects against the will of Congress, where is the difference between our free Government and that of any other nation which may be governed by an absolute czar, emperor, or king?"

McMaster's History of the People of United States, in Volume VII, page 497 and subsequent pages, gives various quotations from newspapers which condemn in the most violent language the conduct of the administration in the Mexican War. These publications appeared during the war.

In Great Britain there has been the same freedom on the part of the press and the public in condemning war policies, as we find has always existed in this country. It would be hard to parallel any denunciations of war in this country with the language used by Lloyd George, in 1901, in considering the Boer War. (See Du Parcq's Life of David Lloyd George, vol. 2, pp. 216, 217, and subsequent pages.)

The philippics delivered by Fox, Burke, and Chatham against the British Government for the prosecution of the war against the American Colonies are among the classics of English literature and familiar to every schoolboy, while the terrific indictment of his Government by John Bright for its part in the Crimean War was a work for which his name is now most honored by his fellow countrymen.

But it is idle to pursue this subject further. Even at the present day there is a strong minority in each of the parliaments of the warring countries of Europe frankly and openly opposed to the policies of their respective governments in this war. Hereto attached and marked Appendix I is a record of the votes against war credits in the German Reichstag and French Chamber of Deputies during the present war and in the House of Commons during the Boer War. I have not been able to find a record of opposition votes in the British Parliament during the present war. The votes given in the appendix are correct according to the legislative reference division of the Library of Congress.

As Appendix 2 to this brief I also attach quotations from German newspapers showing the frank and outspoken opposition to the war on the part of a portion of the German press.

c. The War of 1812.

The war was declared on the 18th day of June, 1812, and concluded by the treaty at Ghent on the 24th day of December, 1814. I shall not here review the distressing events which led up to the declaration of war against Great Britain in 1812. What was endured before taking up arms against Great Britain is well stated in the Garner and Lodge History of the United States, Volume III. In spite of this provocation, however, the Legislature of Massachusetts declared that the war was a "wanton sacrifice of our best interest." The House of Delegates of the State of Maryland, in a memorial addressed to Congress presented in the House of Representatives February 2, 1814, said, among other things, that they were—

"Convinced * * * that the war might have been avoided."

Also,

"That peace might be restored without dishonor to the country the present conjuncture seems to us highly favorable for a reconciliation with England, and it is fairly and honestly desired." (Annals, 13th Cong., 1st and 2d sess., vol. 1, pp. 1205, 1209.)

Hon. Morris S. Miller, a Representative in Congress from the Utica, N. Y., district, in the course of the discussion in the House of Representatives on the bill for the encouragement of enlistments, said:

"We have been told by honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House that, however much we may have been originally opposed to the war, it now becomes our duty to withhold our opposition and afford all the means in our power to carry it on with the utmost vigor. To this opinion I can not subscribe; it goes to the destruction of civil liberty and will not find advocates on this side of the House. This doctrine strikes at the vitals of your republican institutions. It amounts to neither more nor less than this: That a weak and wicked administration (I speak not particularly of the present men in power), finding the confidence of the people withdrawn and their power about to pass into other hands, have nothing to do but to declare war, and instantly all opposition must cease; the men who happen to be in place at the time of the declaration of war, however weak, however incompetent, and however profligate, must be supported at every hazard. To this doctrine I object, as it goes directly to the destruction of civil liberty. The people of this country, I am proud to say it, have an undoubted right to pass upon the conduct of public men and examine the tendency of public measures in war as well as in peace." (Annals, 13th Cong., 1st and 2d sess., vol. 1, p. 956.)

Hon. Abijah Bigelow, a Member of the House of Representatives from Massachusetts, speaking against the loan bill, February 9, 1814, said:

"I shall vote against it on the principle that it is to obtain money to prosecute a war of invasion and conquest—a war which has been as unwisely managed as it was improvidently declared. I shall vote against it on the principle that the measures which preceded and produced it were radically wrong." (Annals, 13th Cong., 1st and 2d sess., vol. 1, p. 1274.)

Hon. Timothy Pitkin, of Connecticut, speaking in the House of Representatives on the bill, said:

"Believing, as I do, that in this war of conquest we are sacrificing our men and expending our money without a prospect of any adequate advantage, I feel justified in voting against a loan of so many millions for this object." (Annals, 13th Cong., 1st and 2d sess., vol. 1, p. 1286.)

Hon. Cyrus King, a Member from Massachusetts, speaking in the House of Representatives upon an amendment to the bill to encourage enlistments in January, 1814, is reported as follows:

"Mr. King said it was not his wish to impede the recruiting service or throw any obstable in the way of it. Far from it. A responsibility, a deep responsibility, certainly rested with those who commenced the war, and every fair and honorable means they could take ought to be allowed them to carry on their war. Gentlemen are accused, said he, of departing from those principles which actuated our forefathers, because they oppose the measures now proposed. I ask the gentleman from Maryland who have, in fact, departed from them? Who are acting over again the former tyranny of the British Government against this people? Who are cutting off our commerce and depriving us of our accustomed modes of industry and support of our families? Against that tyranny we did defend ourselves in time of old, and we shall have no difficulty, when attempted, of again doing the same." (Annals, 13th Cong., 1st and 2d sess., vol. 1, p. 932.)

Hon. Daniel Sheffey, a Representative from Virginia, speaking in the House of Representatives for the bill to provide an additional military force, in January, 1813, said:

"It is said that war having been declared all considerations as to its policy or justice are out of the question, and it is required of us as an imperious duty to unite on the measures which may be proposed by them for its prosecution, and we are promised a speedy, honorable, and successful issue. Do gentlemen require of us to act against our convictions? Do they ask that we should follow with a reluctant step in the career which we believe will end in ruin? Or do they suppose that while on the simplest subject an honest diversity of sentiment exists on this complicated and all-important one our minds are cast into the same mold? Uniformity of action is only desirable where there is uniformity of sentiment, and that on most subjects will only exist where the mind is enchained by the fear which despotic power inspires.

"But it has been said that the obedience to the will of the majority is the first principle of representative government and enjoins what gentlemen require. Yes, sir, obedience to all constitutional acts is a high and commending duty on the part of the minority and the people, and all factious opposition is highly criminal. But this does not prevent anyone in the House or in the Nation to use every effort to arrest the progress of evil or to effect a repeal of measures injurious to the public interest. And how can this be done unless there is full liberty to think and to speak and act as our convictions shall dictate? If this be denied, then there is an end to free government. A majority never can be corrected. They are irresponsible and despotic; they may prepare the yoke when they please; we must submit to it in silence." (Annals, 12th Cong., 2d sess., vol. 3, p. 681.)

Daniel Webster, in a speech in the House of Representatives January 14, 1814, strongly opposing the policy of the administration in prosecuting the war of 1812, and particularly addressing himself to the attempt then made to discourage discussion of the war by those opposed to it, said:

"Important as I deem it to discuss on all proper occasions the policy of the measures at present pursued, it is still more important to maintain the right of such discussion in its full and just extent. Sentiments lately sprung up, and now growing fashionable, make it necessary to be explicit on this point. The more I perceive a disposition to check the freedom of inquiry by extravagant and unconstitutional pretenses the firmer shall be the tone in which I shall exercise it. It is the ancient and undoubted prerogative of this people to canvass public measures and the merits of public men. It is a 'home-bred right', a fireside privilege. It has ever been enjoyed in every house, cottage, and cabin in the Nation. It is not to be drawn into controversy. It is as undoubted as the right of breathing the air or walking on the earth. Belonging to private life as a right, it belongs to public life as a duty; and it is the last duty which those whose representative I am shall find me to abandon. Aiming at all times to be courteous and temperate in its use, except when the right itself shall be questioned, I shall then carry it to its extent. I shall then place myself on the extreme boundary of my right and bid defiance to any arm that would move me from my ground. This high constitutional privilege I shall defend and exercise within this House, and without this House, and in all places; in time of war, in time of peace, and at all times. Living I shall assert it, dying I shall assert it, and should I leave no other inheritance to my children, by the blessing of God I will still leave them the inheritance of free principles and the example of a manly, independent, and constitutional defense of them." (See Annals, 13th Cong., supra.)

4. Analysis of the speech of September 20, 1917.

It will be observed that the only question the subcommittee has ever had before it for consideration outside of procuring a correct copy of the speech, which Senator LA FOLLETTE furnished it, is "the accuracy of the statements contained in the speech." Up to the present time, at least, no evidence has been produced before the committee, of which we have any information, to show that any of the statements made in the speech are inaccurate, nor has the committee complied with Senator LA FOLLETTE'S request, repeatedly made, to specify any portions of the speech the accuracy of which was ever questioned by anyone. The resolution of the Public Safety Commission, which is the basis of this investigation, does not contain any charge or suggestion that any statement in the speech is inaccurate in point of fact. The charge is that the speech "is of a disloyal and seditious nature" and has "served to create treasonable sentiments in the State of Minnesota." Senator LA FOLLETTE has affirmed on this record that he believed all statements in the speech to be true at the time he made them and that he still believes them to be true. Nearly eight months have elapsed since the speech was made and no proof has been forthcoming that any statement in it was inaccurate, and certainly no suggestion has been made that Senator LA FOLLETTE did not believe, and have good reason to believe, in the accuracy of every statement made. In any discussion, therefore, based upon the present state of the record, we must assume the accuracy of the statements made in the speech or at least that Senator LA FOLLETTE believed and had good reason to believe in their accuracy when he made them.

Turning now to the speech in question characterized by the Public Safety Commission as "disloyal and seditious" and declared to have created "treasonable sentiments in the State of Minnesota," it will be found that there is not a word in it suggesting disloyalty or sedition, but, on the contrary, that the speech is highly patriotic and strongly and dramatically urges upon all citizens the duty of defending our Government and of perpetuating our institutions. It is not only the enemy from abroad whose attacks we must meet, according to Senator LA FOLLETTE, but the enemies in our own household. This address, it is to be remembered, was made before "a large audience" composed of the sturdy, intelligent, and independent farmers of the Northwest. The persons present were largely members of a nonpartisan organization formed to advance and protect the interests of the farmers. This was hardly the place one would naturally select to plot treason or to give expression to treasonable or seditious sentiments. Until these days of "public safety commissions," "loyalty leagues," and "vigilance committees," I had supposed that treason was a crime of darkness plotted in secret and its plans matured by stealth, but it seems, according to the charge of the Minnesota "Public Safety" Commission, that Senator LA FOLLETTE launched his disloyal and treasonable utterances before a large audience of that element of our people most earnest and most loyal and most intelligent in their support of our Government and our institutions. I observe from the first page of this speech that Senator LA FOLLETTE'S address was immediately preceded by the singing of our national anthem, to which he paid tribute with words of eloquence and fervor. I suppose that to the members of the Public Safety Commission this is only another evidence of a dark and devilish conspiracy on the part of the farmers of the great Northwest, aided and abetted by Senator LA FOLLETTE, to disrupt and destroy their Government in order that they might turn their farms and homes and their families over to an invading host of German enemies. I wish to treat quite seriously this charge against Senator LA FOLLETTE, for it has been dignified by being made the subject of an investigation by one of the great committees of the Senate of the United States, but, except for the standing which that charge has received by being noticed by a committee of the United States Senate, it would not, I believe, be treated seriously by anyone who has read the speech upon which it is based.

This address starts with the declaration that political parties have failed to give the people real representative government, and that is the reason why the Nonpartisan League has been called into existence. Emphasizing the importance and necessity for patriotism, Senator LA FOLLETTE said:

"Think for a moment for what Washington's army starved and froze at Valley Forge, warming their stiffening fingers at the meager camp fires! It was that we should have builded up here in this country of ours the one Government on this earth that should be truly representative of the people."

Senator LA FOLLETTE then passed rapidly in review the Granger movement and the fight made by himself in Wisconsin and by others in the Middle West to make our Government more representative of the people and to preserve liberty and justice in our laws. The fight over the revenue bill recently passed by the United States Senate was then taken up and the statement made that the little group of Senators who demanded higher taxes for war profits and excessive incomes were simply making the same fight that had been made in Wisconsin and other States of the Middle West to make wealth bear its fair share of the burdens of government. This naturally led up to the fact that we were in war and that the necessity of raising immense sums of money was occasioned by the war, and it is apparent that Senator LA FOLLETTE'S purpose merely was to deal with the war as a fact and consider the question of how the war should be financed. He frankly stated what is well known to everyone, namely, that he was not in favor of going into war, but he added, "I don't mean to say that we had not suffered grievances; we had [a voice, "Yes!"] at the hands of Germany. Serious grievances! [A voice: "You bet!"]

It is evident from the text of the speech that the person interrupting from the audience, knowing that Senator LA FOLLETTE had voted against going into the war, sought to embarrass him in his address by emphasizing the serious nature of the grievances which led a majority of the Congress to vote for the declaration of the war. Senator LA FOLLETTE then did what any ready speaker would do under the circumstances who wished to keep control of his meeting. He made a quick turn upon the interrupter from the audience, mentioning as one of our grievances the interference with our right to travel upon the high seas on ships loaded with munitions for Great Britain. Senator LA FOLLETTE did not say that this was our only grievance or that solely on account of this we went to war. He described this as a technical right and one which was too small to involve us in the awful consequences of this war. This discussion led to a further interruption from the audience, appearing near the top of page 15 of the speech, merely shown by the reporter's notes as "Another interruption." (Committee print.) As a matter of fact, as explained in the note of Senator LA FOLLETTE to the chairman of the committee accompanying the speech, and as is undisputed, this interruption consisted of some one shouting from the audience, "How about the Lusitania?" Senator LA FOLLETTE did not reply to this interruption for a moment, but he said, "Wait just a minute," and then completed his thought and a few sentences later, as shown by the text at the bottom of page 16 and top of page 17, stated that before the Lusitania sailed President Wilson had been warned by Secretary Bryan that she carried explosives and a large amount of ammunition, asserted by the Senator to be 6,000,000 rounds, and that it was in violation of a statute of this country to allow passengers to travel upon vessels carrying dangerous explosives, and that Secretary Bryan appealed to President Wilson to stop passengers from sailing on the Lusitania. Here again it is obvious that all this was said on the spur of the moment in reply to an apparently hostile critic from the audience. Now, this merely stated in detail what, in substance, was common knowledge at the time of the sinking of the Lusitania. The manifest of the Lusitania published at that time in the newspapers of the country showed that she carried a large quantity of ammunition, and a calculation will show that she carried the number of rounds of ammunition stated by Senator LA FOLLETTE. Carrying ammunition was as much a part of the business of the Lusitania at that time and of the other great English vessels as was the carrying of passengers. The people of this country, the Congress, and the administration in power, not only knew the practice but were divided upon the policy of permitting it. Secretary Bryan, as is well known, resigned from the Cabinet and gave publicly as one of the reasons for resigning the fact that the President would not warn passengers not to travel upon munition-laden ships.

One has but to recall the history of the sinking of the Lusitania and interviews given by the United States Senators and others at the time, published generally in the press, and the controversy which raged throughout the country over the wisdom or unwisdom of the President's policy in refusing to warn passengers not to travel on munition-carrying ships to be aware that the substance of everything that Senator LA FOLLETTE said on the subject was at that time common knowledge. If anyone disputes the accuracy of the specific statements made by Senator LA FOLLETTE in this matter and the committee thinks it important to take up the investigation of the question in such a way that the attendance of witnesses may be compelled and the production of documents required, Senator LA FOLLETTE will be pleased to submit the detailed proof of the facts stated, which proof will, I feel sure, satisfy the committee that every statement made by him was correct.

From this point the speech discusses the relative merits of taxation and bond issues as a means of financing the war, and it is so obviously a fair and candid discussion of the subject that I am unable to conceive that even the Public Safety Commission of Minnesota can find any portion of it open to criticism. From the first word to the last in his speech it breathes the spirit of loyalty and devotion to the institutions of this country and to the rights of the common people.

I am aware that when this speech was delivered a large portion of the press of the country misrepresented it and misquoted it. For example, the statement made in the speech that we had suffered serious grievances at the hands of Germany was utterly misquoted, and the statement went broadcast through the press of the country that Senator LA FOLLETTE had said, "We had suffered no grievances at the hands of Germany." In many other respects, also, the speech was glaringly misrepresented. The attack which Senator LA FOLLETTE frankly made in the speech upon those who were profiting largely from the war and escaping just taxation at the same time aroused great bitterness, and, I have no doubt, led to the filing of the charges in question. I suppose that at the time these charges were referred to the subcommittee, and certainly at the time the Senate referred them to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, few, if any, of the Senators had read a true copy of the speech, and this, I assume, accounts for the fact that the speech was even referred to a committee of the Senate for investigation. It is no doubt true that the sentiments expressed in the speech are displeasing to many persons and many interests, but the charge that it contains anything disloyal or seditious or anything that a Senator of the United States, or, for that matter, any citizen, might not properly say is grotesquely absurd. Significant of Senator LA FOLLETTE'S attitude of mind at the time he made the speech, what he did not say is as important as what he did say. Had he desired to embarrass the administration or to raise a doubt concerning the wisdom of the declaration of war he would have referred to the part played by Great Britain as well as by Germany in drawing us into the war.

The protests of our Secretary of State against the unlawful acts of Great Britain are a matter of record as much as are the protests against the unlawful acts of Germany. On the 4th day of April, 1917, Senator LA FOLLETTE made a speech in the Senate in opposition to the declaration of war. That speech shows on his part a complete mastery of the arguments against the declaration of war and a firm conviction that our Government should not declare war. I have heard that speech referred to by gentlemen not in agreement with Senator LA FOLLETTE as one of the ablest ever delivered in the Senate. It certainly marshals in a masterly manner the arguments against the wisdom of the declaration of war. Had it been the thought of Senator LA FOLLETTE in the St. Paul speech to express opinions opposed to the prosecution of this war, or even to the policies of the administration concerning it, he would certainly have stated those reasons against our going into the war which appealed to him as sufficient for opposing the declaration of war. Of course, he would have been entirely within his constitutional rights in so doing. This, however, was no part of the purpose of the speech, as any fair reading of it must show. In this speech to a sympathetic audience Senator LA FOLLETTE stated, as he has stated in the Senate, that the war must be accepted as a fact and dealt with as the best interests of our country and our people require. He did not pretend that he approved our going into the war, but asserted that we were in it in a lawful and constitutional manner and that it brought obligations to every citizen which must be faithfully discharged. The manner of discharging the obligation to raise the money to conduct the war was the theme of Senator LA FOLLETTE'S speech, and he turned aside from the thread of his argument merely to silence interruptions from the audience concerning the grievances which led us into the war, and the Lusitania's sinking, and spoke with self-restraint in so doing. The whole speech shows that Senator LA FOLLETTE did not even attempt to exercise the constitutional rights which he and every other citizen must have to express opinions about the wisdom or unwisdom of our participating in the war.

Was it unlawful for the Lusitania to transport at the same time passengers and dangerous explosives?

It may be urged that Senator LA FOLLETTE was in error in declaring that it was in violation of our statute to carry passengers and dangerous explosives at the same time on the Lusitania. Quite aside from the proposition that an erroneous view of the law is hardly a ground for expelling a Senator from the United States Senate, the fact is that in this, as in other respects, the statement made by Senator LA FOLLETTE was supported by undoubted authority.

In August, 1882, the Congress passed as chapter 374, law of 1882, an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea." That law has been continuously in force from that day to this. It was carried into the last compilation of the Federal statutes (see United States Compiled Statutes, 1916) and is found in sections 7997–8015 of such revision. Section 8 thereof, the section here material, is found in section 8005 of the revision. The statute is also carried in the pamphlet laws issued by the Department of Commerce in 1916, entitled "The laws governing the Steamboat-Inspection Service."

Section 8 of the passenger act of 1882, so far as is here material, is as follows:

"That it shall not be lawful to take, carry, or have on board of any such steamship or other vessel any nitroglycerine, dynamite, or any other explosive article or compound, nor any vitriol or like acids, nor gunpowder, except for the ship's use, nor any article or number of articles, whether as cargo or ballast, which, by reason of the nature or quantity or mode of storage thereof, shall, either singly or collectively, be likely to endanger the health or lives of the passengers or the safety of the vessel."

If we go no further than the manifest of the Lusitania as published in the press of this country on May 8 and 9, 1915, we find that the Lusitania was carrying 4,200 cases of "cartridges and ammunition"; 1,271 cases of "ammunition," besides a large quantity of "military goods." Knowing the minimum amount of gunpowder a cartridge carries and the number of cartridges in a case, it is easily ascertained that the cartridges alone on board the Lusitania contained many tons of gunpowder, not to mention the other "ammunition" referred to.

That gunpowder, although inclosed in the metallic case of a cartridge, especially when carried in such quantities, comes within the prohibition of the above statute is neither open to question under the language of the statute nor according to the decisions of the court.

In United States v. Giordani (163 Fed., 772) the precise question was before Judge Chatfield, Circuit Court of the Southern District, New York. The case was decided June 1, 1908. At that time section 4476 of the Revised Statutes was in force. That section provided:

"Every person who packs or puts up, or causes to be packed or put up for shipment, any gunpowder, nitroglycerin, camphene, naphtha, benzine, benzole, coal oil, crude or refined petroleum, oil of vitriol, nitric acid or other chemical acids, oil or spirits of turpentine, friction matches, or other articles of a like character, otherwise than as directed by the preceding section, or who knowingly ships or attempts to ship the same, or delivers the same to any such vessels as stores, unless duly packed and marked, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000 or imprisonment not exceeding 18 months, or both; one-half of the fine to go to the informer and the articles to be liable to seizure and forfeiture."

The defendant was indicted for violating the above statute. In the opinion it said: "The defendant has been indicted for (1) knowingly unlawfully attempting to ship as merchandise upon the steamer called the Gracia certain casks containing rifle cartridges, each cartridge containing 70 grains, in some cases, and in others 40 grains of gunpowder. * * * (2) For knowingly and unlawfully attempting to ship gunpowder and other articles of like character not duly packed and marked—that is to say, certain cartridges—both indictments being made under the provisions of section 4476 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Compiled Stats., 1901, p. 3052). * * * As will be shown later, the defendant contends that cartridges are not included in the statutory term 'gunpowder.'"

The Gracia was a foreign vessel, and the defendant claimed that the provisions of section 4476 did not apply to the transaction. After disposing of this question, and upon a careful review of the statutes, holding that the statute applied even though the Gracia was a foreign vessel—apparently a freight boat—the court said:

"The further objection that cartridges are not 'gunpowder' but a manufacture of brass and gunpowder does not seem to be well founded. Not only does the United States Government so classify cartridges in its regulations for the carrying of explosives under authority of section 4422 of the Revised Statutes, but the fact that no chemical or physical change of substance has occurred and that the brass envelope, while it protects, does not affect the substance in any way shows that this classification is correct."

The St. Paul speech, for convenience of reference, is hereto attached, marked "Appendix 3," and I have inserted in it the corrections noted by Senator LA FOLLETTE in the letter of October 11 last to the committee, transmitting a copy of the speech.

POINT II.

Since the speech of September 20, 1917, affords no reason for expelling Senator LA FOLLETTE, the charges of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety must be dismissed.

I believe that I have demonstrated from the precedents of the Senate, from the decisions of the courts, and the uniform practice of our people that nothing was said by Senator LA FOLLETTE in his speech of September 20 last at St. Paul which can be construed into opposition to the acts of war policies of the present administration and that he would have been entirely within his rights had he expressed opposition to both. He did not say that the war was unconstitutionally begun by the President, as Mr. Lincoln and a majority of the House of Representatives declared the Mexican War was begun, and declared it, too, in the midst of that war. On the contrary, Senator LA FOLLETTE said that the present war was constitutionally begun and emphasized that fact. He did not say, as Mr. Lincoln and the others said of the Mexican War, that the present war was even unnecessarily begun by the President. On the contrary, he said that we had grievances and serious grievances against Germany which led us into the war. Senator LA FOLLETTE said that with all our grievances, and serious though they were, he regarded them as insufficient justification for our entry into the war, considering the awful consequences which this act was certain to involve. Senator LA FOLLETTE in no way sought to place the responsibility for this war upon the President, as Mr. Lincoln and the other eminent statesmen from whom I have quoted, placed responsibility for the Mexican War upon the then President, Mr. Polk. Senator LA FOLLETTE made no attack upon the integrity or honesty of purpose of the President or his administration, as Mr. Lincoln attacked the honesty of purpose of Mr. Polk and his administration in the Mexican War. There is not a word in the St. Paul speech which questions the motive of any public official who had any responsibility for the war program or war policy of the administration. Yet, I assert, after a careful reading of the history of all the wars in which this country has been engaged, that no man had ever been attacked and assailed by a war party and a war-mad press as Senator LA FOLLETTE had been attacked even prior to the St. Paul speech. In the St. Paul speech, as always, Senator LA FOLLETTE'S condemnation was of measures not men, of policies that he believed to be wrong, not the individuals immediately responsible for those policies for he knows how unjust it is to hold an individual responsible for a bad policy who is often himself merely a victim rather than the authority of such a policy.

Senator LA FOLLETTE came to St. Paul and made the speech of September 20 directly from his work in the Senate, where for weeks, and I believe months, he had been laboring night and day to increase the amount which excess profits and surplus incomes would contribute to the expenses of this war. He spoke to the people with directness and great earnestness concerning what he believed to be the wrong policy of the majority of Congress upon this subject, but he said only what he had a right to say, only what, believing as he did, it would have been cowardly and unpatriotic not to say. I ask that the members of this committee will put beside anything that Senator LA FOLLETTE said in the St. Paul speech the statements during the time of war made by Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Webster, Mr. Clay, and others in condemnation of the war policies they were discussing, and then determine whether anything Senator LA FOLLETTE said is fairly open to adverse criticism.

Whether Senator LA FOLLETTE was right or wrong in opposing the declaration of war, whether he was right or wrong in opposing the passage of the draft law, whether he was right or wrong in the causes which he believes led us into the war, whether he is right or wrong in his views concerning the financing of this war, is immaterial. He had a right to his views, and he had a right to express them, precisely as any Senator of any citizen has a right to express his views upon the same questions.

I assume, therefore, that however fundamentally any other Senator may differ from Senator LA FOLLETTE, there is and will be no thought in the minds of any of criticizing, of censuring, Senator LA FOLLETTE for any expressions in the St. Paul speech. It would be strange indeed if the policy should be adopted in the Senate of the United States that the majority might condemn expressions of opinion by the minority made outside of the Senate and not in the discharge of legislative duty.

No question of censure can arise in this case, however, for under the Constitution no such power exists in the Senate. Under section 5 of Article I, previously quoted, the Senate may do two things:

1. It may by a two-thirds vote expel a Member for any reason or for no reason.

2. It may punish a Member for disorderly behavior.

The "disorderly behavior" for which each House may punish its Members, as provided in the foregoing quoted portion of section 5 of Article I of the Constitution, is some sort of misbehavior committed by the Member in the presence of the House, or, in any case, it must be conduct which directly obstructs the action of the House in the performance of its legislative duties.

In Rawle on the Constitution, second edition, page 47, it is said:

"It has not yet been precisely settled what must be the disorderly behavior to incur punishment, nor what kind of punishment is to be inflicted; but it can not be doubted that misbehavior out of the walls of the House, or within them, when it is not in session, would not fall within the meaning of the Constitution. Expulsion may, however, be founded on criminal conduct committed in any place, and either before or after conviction in a court of law."

In Kilbourne v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168, p. 189) it is said:

"As we have already said, the Constitution expressly empowers each House to punish its Members for disorderly behavior. We see no reason to doubt that this punishment may in a proper case be imprisonment and that it may be for refusal to obey some rule on that subject made by the House for the preservation of order. So also the penalty which each House is authorized to inflict in order to compel the attendance of absent Members may be imprisonment, and this may be for a violation of some order or some standing rule on that subject."

As said in the same case, page 182, referring to the same provisions of the Constitution:

"These provisions are equally instructive in what they authorize and in what they do not authorize. There is no express power in that instrument conferred on either House of Congress to punish for contempts."

As held in the Kilbourne case, supra, the analogy to the power of the English Parliament in this respect which is sometimes drawn is erroneous, because the latter was formerly a judicial body and has the inherent power of a court to punish for contempt. Indeed, the Kilbourne case leaves it doubtful whether either the Senate or the House takes any power to punish by implication as necessary to a successful exercise of the legislative function.

This whole subject has been recently considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in Marshall v. Gordon (243 U. S., 521). In that case Marshall, United States district attorney for the Southern District of New York, was arrested on a warrant from the House of Representatives, having been declared by the House guilty of contempt of that body on account of a letter written and statements made by said Marshall concerning the conduct of a committee appointed by the House of Representatives to inquire into certain official conduct of the said district attorney. Marshall applied for discharge on habeas corpus, and the correctness of the judgment of the district court refusing such discharge was the question presented on the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court held that the House of Representatives had no power under the Constitution to declare the conduct of the district attorney in writing the letter in question contempt of its authority and to inflict punishment upon the writer for such contempt. The point of the decision is that the only power the House has to punish for contempt is that necessary to self-preservation to enable it to perform its functions as a legislative body. In so far as the power to punish for contempt is necessary to enable the House to carry on the work of legislation it has such power, but it has absolutely nothing beyond that. As stated in the opinion, page 542, such power "rests only upon the right of self-preservation; that is, the right to prevent acts which in and of themselves inherently obstruct or prevent the discharge of legislative duty."

All of this is said concerning the power of the House to punish one not a Member of that body, but it applies with even greater force to a Member for reason that in the latter case the Constitution plainly specifies the misconduct for which a Member may be punished, and, as said in the Kilbourn case, this provision of the Constitution is not more instructive in what it authorizes than in what it does not authorize.

In the Marshall case, supra, the court says (p. 536):

"No power was expressly conferred by the Constitution of the United States on the subject (punishment for contempt) except that given to the House to deal with contempt committed by its own Members. (Art. I, sec. 5.) As the rule concerning the Constitution of the United States is that powers not delegated were reserved to the people or to the States, it follows that no other express authority to deal with contempt can be conceived of."

The Constitution having specified "disorderly behavior" as the sole ground upon which each House may punish its Members, besides of course its power to punish for violation of its rules, it follows that every other ground or cause of punishment is excluded. Expressio unius est exclusivo alterius. But even if it were admitted that in the case of Members the House took by implication some power to punish, it is obvious that such power can not go beyond preventing the obstruction of the performance of the legislative duty of that body. However irritated, indignant, or offended any Senator may be by the speech in question, the Constitution has wisely withheld from the Senate any power to punish a Member merely because in a public address outside the Senate he may make remarks which Senators believe will have an ill effect upon the public mind, or which for any cause arouses their indignation or resentment.

In concluding this argument, already much too long, I only desire to say that I have discussed this case as though the charges considered were made against the humblest private citizen in the land. I have claimed nothing for Senator LA FOLLETTE by reason of his long record of devoted service to the public interest, as attested by his official acts not only as a Member of the United States Senate for many years but as a Member of the House of Representatives for six years and as three times governor of his State. I have not questioned the purpose or motive of those making the charges here under consideration. I confess that it has not been altogether easy to pursue this course. When one recalls the work of Senator LA FOLLETTE in private as well as public life in behalf of democratic government and just laws, unmarred by any selfish purpose or desire for personal gain, it is hard to consider dispassionately the charge of disloyalty—the most serious that can be made against any man—lodged against him by the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety. It is true that all the newspapers of the country served by the Associated Press the day after the speech entirely misquoted Senator LA FOLLETTE, as proved by the record, and made him say the very opposite of what he really said concerning our grievances against Germany which led to the war. It is true this falsehood has been repeated and multiplied during all the months that have since elapsed and has been cunningly used to procure votes of condemnation from various individuals and bodies throughout the country. Through all this Senator LA FOLLETTE has remained silent. He has felt that this proceeding before this honorable committee was at least quasi judicial in character and that a decision should be arrived at uninfluenced by anything except the facts and the law as presented to this committee. Even if Senator LA FOLLETTE had said the things he is charged with saying, he would have been entirely within his rights, as I believe has hereinbefore demonstrated; but when what he actually said is considered it is seen how wholly unsupported is the charge of "disloyalty." It is only by distorting the impromptu retorts of Senator LA FOLLETTE to the interruptions from the audience into a complete discussion of the intricate causes of the war that anything can be found in the speech to which the most zealous partisans of the administration can object. But under any construction possible to put upon it, it does not even approach to an improper discussion of the war.

There never was a more baseless attack made upon the character and reputation of a public man than that made upon Senator LA FOLLETTE by the filing of the charges in question.

I respectfully submit that this honorable committee should promptly report said charges to be wholly unfounded.

GILBERT E. ROE.
Attorney for Senator Robert M. La Follette.

"Even if the British sea power, which to-day dictates the conditions under which the seas are to be used, could be broken, hardly anything would be gained thereby. For, if the British fleet would have to cede its position to some other power, the latter would undoubtedly pursue, not a policy of sentiment, but one of materialism—to do what best serves its own interests."

The above appeared in the New York Globe of Friday, April 12, 1918.

The Arbeiter Zeitung, of Vienna, is quoted in the Washington Times of April 29, 1918, in criticism of Germany's policy of annexations in Russia. It said: "We are not going to allow Austrian blood to be shed, either now or later on, to retain German conquests."

SPEECH OF ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, DELIVERED AT THE MUNICIPAL AUDITORIUM, ST PAUL, MINN., SEPTEMBER 20, 1917, AS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR LA FOLLETTE TO THE SUBCOMMITTEE.

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, it is needless for me to say anything about the importance of this conference conducted under the auspices of the Nonpartisan League.

It speaks for itself.

It is a nonpartisan league.

Why a nonpartisan league? Why has such an organization been formed in this and other States of the Union?

Because, Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, political parties have failed to give the people of this country real representative government. [Cheers and applause.]

What is representative government?

Every man or woman in this audience who stood up here to-night when you sang that glorious anthem, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," answers that question. What was it for which men died in 1776?

It was that the Government established by their valor and their devotion and their sacrifice, sealed with their blood, should be a real representative government.

What is a representative government?

A government that represents all of the people. [Cheers and applause.]

And when some of you who stood up in this audience while that glorious sentiment, set to heart-inspiring music, was being given forth, because some of you who stood up at that time have forgotten the sacrifices made in 1776, made again in the sixties, in order that that kind of a government should be preserved. Because some of you are testifying a devotion to liberty which you do not feel. [Applause.]

Who is it, abroad over this country now, waiving the flags and crying out for democracy in the loudest possible tones? [Cries from the audience: "The profiteers!" "Big business!"]

It is business that is making money out of existing conditions. That is what it is. [Cheers and applause.]

You new converts to democracy are masquerading in the livery of heaven while you serve the devil! [Cheers and applause.]

Think for a moment for what Washington's army starved and froze at Valley Forge, warming their stiffening fingers at the meager camp fires. It was that we should have builded up here in this country of ours the one government on this earth that should be truly representative of the people. [Cheers and applause.]

What did that mean? It meant the election of two United States Senators from every State of the Union, and a Member of Congress from every unit of representation agreed upon, who are to assemble at the seat of government, under the Constitution, on the first Monday of December of each year, and there represent, never themselves, never the United States Steel Co., never the munition makers, but always representing the people.

They should vote for laws that were for the good of the Republic. That is what it meant. [Cheers and applause.]

Fellow citizens, when it becomes necessary for an organization, or when any considerable number of people come together in State after State of the Union, and seek to form a nonpartisan league, in order that they may get true representative government, it means that some power has come between the people and their Representatives, and that they are not getting representative government under partisan domination. [Cheers and applause.]

I am reminded as I face this magnificent audience here to-night; I am carried back in memory to the early seventies. Do you realize, fellow citizens, that here at the head of the Mississippi Valley, here in what was called the old Northwest, in the early seventies, was formed the great granger movement to grapple with corporate power and restore representative government to the people of that day? [Applause.]

Have you forgotten, or is it possible that the younger generation have never been informed, that here at the head of that valley, formed by the great father of all the waters, was cradled the first independent institution which went out to fight corporate power in the United States?

Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Iowa were the four Commonwealths that for the first time in the history of the government of men declared the right of the people to have administered by them the control of the highways that lead to market.

Are you aware of the fact that you are the inheritors of a precious legacy here in Minnesota? A legacy that has not always been protected; but here in Minnesota, and in the State of my nativity lying to the south, and Iowa and in Michigan, was born the first great independent farmer movement for the control of railroad transportation—for the subjugation of great corporations to public interests, instead of permitting those corporations to control ruthlessly in their own interest all of the highways leading to the markets of the country.

Gentlemen, you are the descendants of the men who made that wonderful historic contest. For let me say to you that out of that movement that started in these four States, that proclaimed for the first time in the history of the world the right of the public to fix the charges upon the iron highways of commerce, that out of that wonderful movement started in the homes of the farmers of Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois—I said Michigan a moment ago; I should have said Illinois—in those four States, in the homes of those farmers, started that movement for the first time in the history of the world asserting the right of the public to control railway transportation and railway rates over the railroads leading to the markets of the country.

From that propitious hour there spread to the East and to the West that movement the germ of which was the right of the public to control these transportation companies until it became the settled law of the land.

When it was first asserted by the people of Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois the owners of the railroads denounced it as an interference with private property and private rights. But the old Granger movement, pursuing that great idea that when these corporations are permitted to take private property on which to build their depots and their rights of way that they at once become the servants of the people and their property is subject to public control. [Applause.]

It can not be too strongly emphasized—and I speak of it in connection with this nonpartisan farmers' movement—it can not be too strongly emphasized that that wonderful assertion of a public right was the result of the logical thinking of the farmer as he followed his plow. He reasoned that if the corporation has a right to take his property without his consent, and at a price fixed by the public, on which to build its depot grounds and its right of way it must be in the same position that the county or the State or the township is in when it takes his property to build a highway, to locate a school building, or to build a public institution. That it was taking his property without his consent and at a price fixed by the public—by statute. That it was taking that property under a public right, and that the highway, the iron highway, the depot, the right of way so taken could not be considered as private property.

That was a wonderful piece of reasoning upon the part of the men who followed the plow. And let me say to you that the advanced political thought and the political philosophy, social philosophy, of this country of ours finds the germ and the development and the fruitage upon the farms of the country. [Cheers and applause.]

And it is for that reason that agriculture is the basis of statehood. It is the basis, the stable basis, of a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. So I have faith that this new movement up here, known as the nonpartisan organization, born on the farms of this great old Northwest Territory, contains within it the seeds of a great social and political advancement. [Cheers and applause.]

And, Mr. President and fellow citizens, ladies and gentlemen, I know you will pardon me for harking back to the old Granger movement. I am constrained to believe that this new movement is but another crop of the seeding of that time. Now, fellow citizens, there would not be the slightest occasion in the world for the Nonpartisan League and you would not be able to enlist the farmers of a dozen, 15, or 20 different States in this Union unless there was something fundamentally wrong with our Government.

There is something fundamentally wrong with it. [Cheers and applause.]

Of course—of course, I know that the fellows who are waving the flags of to-day most frantically [laughter], the bloated representatives of wealth, who are shouting loudest for democracy to-day, are trying to invest this particular time with a new form of democracy. [Laughter, cheers, and applause.]

A democracy that has attached to it as a cardinal principle, not liberty, not equality, but profits. [Laughter, applause, and cheers.]

And, my friends, you can not enlist the thinking, intellectual, conservative population found upon the farms of this section of the country, which was known when I was a boy as the old Northwest Territory, you can not stir that population very deeply and very profoundly unless there is a profound reason for it. [Applause.]

And that profound reason, if you will be a bit critical and a bit analytical, you will find is due to the fact that the very men who are shouting at the top of their voices about democracy to-day are the men who have been pillaging the hard-working sons of toil, not only upon the farms but in the factories of the country. [Cheers and applause.]

Oh, fellow citizens, I welcome the advent of this organization, for I know full well that it has already secured a momentum that will carry it forward. [Cheers and applause.]

No orders from some secret-service employees, or from some Department of Justice, will be able to throttle this great movement that stands for real representative government. [Cheers and applause.]

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, when I speak in this tone of voice do you hear me back there? [Laughter.]

Are you able to hear me when I talk in this tone of voice, back there in that alcove? [A voice from the audience: "Yes!"]

Well, all right. [Laughter.] I'll use just a little less voice, then. Because I want to be heard, and at the same time I want to save my voice. [Laughter.] I have got use for it! [Laughter and applause.] And I propose to use it. [A voice: "Good!"]

Our Constitution will never fail us for free speech. [A voice from the audience: We don't take the Tribune, Bob!"] [Another voice: "Nor the Journal, either!"] [A voice: "We don't subscribe "——]

No; I don't take the political dope of any paper that serves interests hostile to representative government. [Applause and cheers.]

Now, fellow citizens, I came before you here to-night to talk to you particularly about this great movement that you have started up here, and to give you a word of encouragement. To bid you to be brave! Not to be intimidated because there may chance to be sneaking about here and there men who will pull back their coats and show a secret-service badge. [Laughter and applause.]

Until Bunker Hill is destroyed; until Little Round Top, and the Hornet's Nest at Gettysburg shall have been obliterated and relegated to oblivion there shall still be free speech in this country. [Great cheering.]

Mr. President, I have stood all my life for law and order. [Cheers and applause.]

Twenty years ago this very season, at a little farmers' gathering in Ferndale, Wis., I opened the fight against corporate power in that State. [Cheers and applause.]

Mr. POMERENE. I send to the desk the minority report and ask that it may be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read the views of the minority submitted by Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

I regret not being able to concur in the report of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections recommending the dismissal of the proceedings pending against the Senator from Wisconsin.

The form which this report shall assume is prompted in part by the course of the arguments leading the majority of the committee to its conclusions.

Under the Constitution the Senate is the judge of the qualifications of its members. The only constitutional qualifications of a Senator are that he shall "have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and, when elected, an inhabitant of the State for which he shall have been chosen." Within these limitations the Senate is the sole judge of the qualifications of its members.

The Senate is authorized to "determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member."

By reason of the authority thus conferred upon the Senate, under the constitutional provisions quoted, I am clearly of the opinion:

First. That, except as stated, there are no limitations upon the power of the Senate to determine the qualifications of its members except those imposed by a sound judicial discretion.

Second. That the Senate may adopt such rules of proceeding as to it may seem proper.

Third. That it may punish its members for "disorderly behavior," and that this power to so punish is only limited by the sound discretion of the Senate, no matter whether disorderly behavior be a statutable offense or not, committed during the session of the Senate, or in recess, in its presence, or beyond it.

It extends, in my judgment, to every kind of disorderly behavior, wherever and whenever committed during his incumbency in office. No Senator can throw aside the habiliments of his office during his term, neither when the Senate is in session, nor when he leaves the Chamber, nor when he is outside of the Capitol. During his term, wherever he is, or whatever he may be doing, he is still a Senator of the United States, under the restraints of his senatorial obligations, which he can not and ought not to be permitted to escape, no matter what his purpose or what the effect may be upon him personally.

Fourth. That, within its discretion, the Senate may try a member and exonerate him, or expel him (with the concurrence of two-thirds), or administer between these two extremes any other punishment which to it may seem fit and proper under all the evidence.

These conclusions are based upon the following considerations:

DISORDERLY BEHAVIOR.

What is meant by "disorderly behavior"? The history of this provision of the Constitution will give some light. When the committee on detail in the Constitutional Convention reported this section, Mr. Madison observed that "the right of expulsion was too important to be exercised by a bare majority of a quorum, and in emergency or factions might be dangerous." He moved to insert the words "with the concurrence of two-thirds." "With this phrase eliminated it must be seen that the words 'for disorderly behavior' qualify both verbs—the word 'punish' and the word 'expel.' With these words inserted, it means that the House may punish its Members and expel them for 'disorderly behavior.'" (Watson on the Constitution, vol. I, p. 290.)

It can not be that the phrase "disorderly behavior" can be limited in its usual acceptation to mean "disorderly conduct," as was contended in the committee. If this were true, then it must follow that the framers of the Constitution specifically provided for the punishment and expulsion of Members for "disorderly behavior," using the phrase in a sense so restricted as to include only the higher class of crimes, and leaving without penalty entirely that class of offenses commonly denominated as misdemeanors; or it was made so broad in its scope as to permit of expulsion no matter how frivolous or insignificant the dereliction may have been, and this is not probable. If it had been thus intended to apply this phrase to the higher class of crimes only, some more appropriate term would have been chosen.

It can not be that "disorderly behavior" is synonymous with "disorderly conduct," as these words are commonly understood, because it would be a misnomer to speak of treason, or any of the higher class of crimes, as merely "disorderly conduct."

It can not be that the phrase "disorderly behavior" was intended to include only statutable offenses, because such a restricted construction would leave the Senate powerless to purge itself of the presence of Members who might be guilty of the grossest kind of immorality or impropriety, and which might be even more offensive in the minds of Senators than the purely statutory offenses. In discussing the power to expel in the case of Mr. REED SMOOT, the able Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. KNOX, said:

"The Constitution enables the Senate to protect itself against improper characters by expelling them by a two-thirds vote if they are guilty of crimes, offensive immorality, disloyalty, or gross impropriety during their terms of service." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 41, p. 2935.)

And I assert that this is true, whether the offenses named are statutory or not.

It can not be that the Senate's power to punish shall be limited to acts or words uttered in the Chamber during a session of the Senate, because, if thus restricted, then a Senator could be guilty of any impropriety, or any immorality, no matter how greatly it might shock the moral sense of the public or how embarrassing it might become to the Senate, and it would be powerless to protect itself. In other words, it is my belief that this language was intended to be all comprehensive and to include disorderly behavior and to give to the Senate the right to punish its Members for any disorderly behavior or for any crime, high or low, wherever committed, during their incumbency in office, and that power is only limited by the sound discretion of the Senate.

Mr. Justice Story, in his work on the Constitution, fifth edition, section 837, says:

"No person can doubt the propriety of the provision authorizing each House to determine the rules of its own proceedings. If the power did not exist, it would be utterly impracticable to transact the business of the Nation, either at all or at least with decency, deliberation, and order. The humblest assembly of men is understood to possess this power, and it would be absurd to deprive the councils of the Nation of a like authority. But the power to make rules would be nugatory, unless it be coupled with a power to punish for disorderly behavior or disobedience to those rules. And as a Member might be so lost to all sense of dignity and duty as to disgrace the House by the grossness of his conduct, or interrupt its deliberations by perpetual violence or clamor, the power to expel for very aggravated misconduct was also indispensable, not as a common but as an ultimate redress for the grievance. But such a power, so summary, and at the same time so subversive of the rights of the people, it was foreseen, might be exerted for mere purposes of faction or party, to remove a patriot, or to aid a corrupt measure; and it has therefore been wisely guarded by the restriction that there shall be a concurrence of two-thirds of the Members to justify an expulsion. This clause requiring a concurrence of two-thirds was not in the original draft of the Constitution, but it was inserted by a vote of 10 States, one being divided. A like general authority to expel exists in the British House of Commons and in the legislative bodies of many of the States composing the Union."

"Disorderly behavior" is the antithesis of good behavior. A Federal judge holds his office during good behavior. The meaning of these words will aid in the construction of the former.

Tucker, in his Constitutional Law, page 418, says:

"These words (good behavior) do not mean that a judge shall decide rightly, but that he shall decide conscientiously. He is not amenable to impeachment for a wrong decision, else when an inferior judge is reversed he would be impeachable; or, in the Supreme Court, a dissenting judge might be held impeachable because a large majority of the court affirmed the law to be otherwise. But if he decides unconscientiously—if he decides contrary to his honest conviction from corrupt partiality—this can not be good behavior, and he is impeachable. Again, if the judge is drunken on the bench, this is ill behavior, for which he is impeachable. And all of these are generally criminal or misdemeanor, for misdemeanor is a synonym for misbehavior. So, if he omits a judicial duty, as well as when he commits a violation of duty, he is guilty of crime or misdemeanor, for, says Blackstone, 'Crime or misdemeanor is an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it.'"

"To confine the impeachable offenses to those which are made crimes or misdemeanors by statute, or other specific law, would too much constrict the jurisdiction to meet the obvious purpose of the Constitution, which was, by impeachment, to deprive of office those who, by any act of omission or commission, showed clear and flagrant disqualification to hold it. On the other hand, to hold that all departures from, or failures in, duty, which were not willful but due to mistake, inadvertence, or misjudgment, and to let in all offenses at common law, which, by the decisions of the Supreme Court, are not within Federal authority at all, would be to extend the jurisdiction by impeachment far beyond what was obviously the purpose and design of its creation. It must be criminal misbehavior—a purposed defiance of official duty—to disqualify a man from holding office, or disable him from ever after holding office, which constitutes the penalty upon conviction under the impeachment process. The punishment, upon conviction, indicates the character of the crime or misdemeanor for which impeachment is constitutional. If the crime or misdemeanor for which the impeachment is made be not such as to justify the punishment inflicted, we may well conclude it was within the purpose of the Constitution in using the impeachment procedure.

"The same reasoning will apply to other offices of the United States as has thus been applied to the judicial office.

"The power of removal in other offices than the judicial is with the Executive and if exercised by removal the evil of his incumbency is at an end. But if the Executive should refuse to remove an officer who commits a violation of duty, or wholly omits to discharge it; if the appointing power screens from removal one flagrantly delinquent in duty, the impeachment power is the reserve instrumentality by which the Constitution will remove the official delinquent in spite of the action of the Executive in retaining him in the office which he disgraces. His flagrant misbehavior may work, through impeachment, his exclusion from office whom a wicked Executive would perpetuate in the official station he is disqualified to fill."

We are not, however, without guidance on this question in the election cases tried in the Senate.

In July, 1797, William Blount was expelled from the Senate for "a high misdemeanor entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator."

Mr. Blount had written a letter to an American agent among the Indians, attempting to seduce him as a faithful interpreter, and to employ him as an engine to alienate the affections and confidence of the Indians from the public officers of the United States residing among them. "It was not a statutable offense, nor was it committed in his official character, nor was it committed during the session of Congress, nor at the seat of government." By a vote of yeas 25, nays 1, he was expelled from the Senate. Mr. Justice Story says (sec. 838):

"It seems, therefore, to be settled by the Senate, upon full deliberation, that expulsion may be for any misdemeanor which, though not punishable by any statute, is inconsistent with the trust and duty of a Senator."

Mr. Tucker, in his work on the Constitution, concurs in this view.

John Smith, a Senator, was tried by the Senate in April, 1808. He was charged with participation in a conspiracy with Aaron Burr. The motion to expel him lacked one vote of the constitutional majority of two-thirds. The vote was: Yeas, 19; nays, 10.

Mr. Justice Story, in discussing this case, says:

"The precise ground of the failure of the motion does not appear; but it may be gathered from the arguments of his counsel that it did not turn upon any doubt that the power of the Senate extended to cases of misdemeanor not done in the presence or view of the body."

ESPIONAGE ACT OF JUNE 15, 1917.

Now, in light of what I conceive to be the unlimited power of the Senate to determine the rules of its proceedings, to punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, to expel a Member, let us examine the situation as it must present itself to the mind while considering the charges which have been filed with the Senate against Senator LA FOLLETTE.

On April 6, 1917, the Congress of the United States declared a state of war against the German Imperial Government, the greatest military power of modern times.

On May 18, 1917, Congress passed a draft law providing for the creation of an army to carry on the war, and by its terms required all male persons between the ages of 21 and 31, inclusive, to enroll or register for military service, excluding, of course, aliens who had not declared their intention to become citizens, and made them subject to call by the President from time to time into the military and naval forces of the United States; and by the law of the land these men constituted a part of the military and naval forces of the country.

On June 5, 1917, the registration of all men within the military age began throughout the entire country.

On June 15, 1917, the Congress passed the so-called espionage act making it a penal offense, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for anyone when the United States is at war—

First. "To willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States, or to promote the success of its enemies;" or

Second. "To willfully cause or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States;" or

MILITARY CONDITIONS IN THE COUNTRY.

On September 5, 1917, the first call was issued for 687,000 men, and other calls were made thereafter at short intervals. The young men thus called, and to be called, to the colors, came from all sections of the country. With rare exceptions they responded with alacrity for the defense of their country and for the protection of humanity.

On September 20, 1917, Senator LA FOLLETTE made the speech which is the subject of controversy before the Nonpartisan League in St. Paul, Minn.

At this time it was within common knowledge of the people generally that the I. W. W.'s, the extreme Socialists, the well-intentioned but misguided pacifists, and certain German propaganists were sowing the seeds of dissension and insubordination, and spreading their poison throughout the country for the purpose of discrediting the Government in its prosecution of the war. Some of them were taking this course because they were opposed to all war; others because they were opposed to this war; and still others because they were using their utmost endeavors to aid the enemy and to render impotent, so far as they could, our own forces. State and local authorities and the loyal citizens of the land, with the approval of the Government, were organizing associations for the purpose of checking acts of disloyalty and sedition in their respective communities, and among these organizations was the Minnesota Public Safety Commission, which filed the complaint now under consideration.

On May 7, 1915, the Lusitania was sunk by a German submarine with a loss of more than 1,100 lives, 114 of whom were American citizens, without warning, and without providing for the safety of the passengers and crew—an act of piracy, so recognized by everyone save Germany and those who sympathized with her.

But this was not all. Before Congress passed the joint resolution declaring a state of war, the German submarines had sunk in the same way and by the same means 20 American vessels with a total loss of human life aggregating nearly 300 American lives. After repeated negotiations covering almost a year, on the 4th day of May, 1916, the German Imperial Government sent its note to the United States advising this Government that Germany had given instructions to her submarine commanders not to sink vessels without giving warning and without caring for the safety of passengers and crew in conformity with the rules of international law, unless they sought to escape; but intimated that upon certain contingencies this mode of warfare might be resumed. With this announcement the country believed the crisis had passed and all minor controversies could be adjusted, and except for Germany's subsequent aggressions there would have been no war.

But on January 31, 1917, the United States was advised that after February 1, 1917, Germany would resume without restrictions her submarine warfare on belligerent and neutral ships alike that would pass through a war zone estimated to be 1,400 miles long and 400 miles wide, through which nine-tenths of its commerce, aggregating at that time more than $6,000,000,000 annually, would have to pass; that only one ship could go each week, on Thursday, into Great Britain from the United States, and one ship return on Sunday, each week, from Great Britain. Only one day's notice was given to us, notwithstanding the fact that the German Imperial Government had determined as early as January 19 to resume this warfare, as is evidenced by the message which was sent to Bernstorff to be transmitted to the German ambassador in Mexico urging him to incite Mexico and Japan to begin war against us.

These were among the causes that led to the war, and these facts must have been known to the Senator from Wisconsin, and yet in his speech at St. Paul he said:

"Now, fellow citizens, we are in the midst of a war. For my own part I was not in favor of beginning the war. [Cheers and applause.]

"I do not mean to say that we had not suffered grievances; we had—[A voice: "Yes!"] at the hands of Germany. Serious grievances! [A voice: "You bet!"]

"We had cause for complaint. They had interfered with the right of American citizens to travel upon the high seas—on ships loaded with munitions for Great Britain. [Laughter, cheers, and applause.]

"Let me have the time; I have got to catch a train—unless I am stopped by somebody [laughter], and I have never been stopped yet! [Laughter and applause.]

"Cut it out. Let me have the time. I would not be understood as saying that we did not have grievances. We did. And upon those grievances, which I regarded as insufficient, considering the amount involved and the rights involved, which was the right to ship munitions to Great Britain with American passengers on board to secure a safe transit. [Laughter and applause.]

"We had a right, a technical right, to ship the munitions, and the American citizens have a technical right to ride on those vessels. I was not in favor of the riding on them [laughter], because it seemed to me that the consequences resulting from any destruction of life that might occur, would be so awful—[A voice: "Yellow!"]

"What did you say? [A voice: "Yellow!"]

"Any man who says that in an audience where he can conceal his identity is yellow himself. [Many cries: "Put him out!" "Put him out!"]

"Sit down everybody. I do not want any of that in an audience where I am speaking. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

"All I want is order. I will take care of everybody that interrupts if you will just give me the chance. [Cheers and applause.]

"I say this, that the comparatively small privilege of the right of an American citizen to ride on a munition-loaded ship flying a foreign flag is too small to involve this Government in the loss of millions and millions of lives! [Cheers and applause.]

"Now—[A voice interrupting: "Where is the yellow guy now?"] [Another voice: "Give it to him, LA FOLLETTE!"] [Order!]

"Now, fellow citizens, I didn't believe that we should have gone into this war for that poor privilege. [A voice: 'Nobody else!']

"The right of an American citizen to travel upon a foreign vessel loaded with munitions of war. Because——[Another interruption.]

"Wait just a minute. Let me state my position. Because a foreign vessel loaded with munitions of war is technically foreign territory [cheers and applause], and an American citizen takes his life in his own hands, just as much as he would if he were on the territory of France and camped in the neighborhood of an arsenal! [Cheers and applause.]

"Mr. President, it has sometimes occurred to me that the shippers of munitions of war, who were making enormous profits out of the business, invited and encouraged American citizens to ride on those ships, in order to give a sort of semblance of safety to the passage of their profiteering cargo abroad. [Cheers and applause.]

"But, Mr. President, we went into the war by the adoption by Congress of a declaration of war in constitutional form. [Applause.] I was not in favor of going into the war illegally.

"I resisted the right to arm merchantmen, when I knew that that would result in producing a condition that would bring about war without a declaration by Congress; and the Constitution says that Congress, not the acts of the President, shall bring on a war with a foreign government. [Cheers and applause.]

"But war was declared, and lawfully declared.

"It was not brought about by an unlawful and piratical arming of merchant ships. I had a little bit to do with stopping that on the 4th of March, and I put it to my everlasting credit that I was able to do it. [Cheers and applause.] We are in the war. And, at least, we are lawfully in the war.

"Now, then, the war entails expenses. [Laughter.]

"You can not run a war in these days without paying for it. [Laughter.]

"It is a costly enterprise. Every one of the nations, the belligerent nations of Europe, are reeling under the financial burdens that war—this war of all wars in the history of the world—has laid upon them. Every one of the foreign nations up to last April, when we entered the war, had passed the line of safety, so far as ever being able to redeem their financial obligations were concerned. Every one except Great Britain. Whenever any government is paying out for its obligations more than—for its current obligations—more than 25 per cent of its income, that nation has passed the line where it is safe to loan to it. [Applause.]

"Every belligerent nation in Europe last April, except Great Britain, had passed that line. Never—this is a tritism to say—never before in the history of the human race was a war in progress that so, day by day, hour by hour, moment by moment, sapped the very lifeblood, the financial lifeblood, of the existence of the nation as a stable entity.

"And, fellow citizens, it behooves a nation to consider well before it enters upon a war of that sort, how much it has got at stake. If all it has got at stake is the loans of the house of Morgan made to foreign governments, and the profits that the munition makers will earn in shipping their products to foreign countries, then I think it ought to be weighed not in a common hay scale but in an apothecary's scale. [Laughter and applause.]

"Ah, but somebody will tell you American rights are involved.

"What American rights? The right of some person to ride upon a munition-laden vessel in violation of an American statute, that no vessel that carries explosives shall carry passengers. [Cheers and applause.]

"Four days before the Lusitania sailed President Wilson was warned in person by Secretary of State Bryan, that the Lusitania had 6,000,000 rounds of ammunition on board, besides explosives; and that the passengers who proposed to sail on that vessel were sailing in violation of a statute of this country; that no passenger shall sail or travel upon a railroad train or upon a vessel which carries dangerous explosives. [Cheers and applause.]

"And Secretary Bryan appealed to President Wilson to stop passengers from sailing on the Lusitania.

"I am giving you some history that probably has not been given you here before. [Cheers.]

"So, I say that the grievances that carried this country into war, into a war the limits of which, as to the loss of life, and the burdens—financial burdens—that shall be laid upon us, can not be calculated by any man—I say that the conditions that carried us into that war needed to be weighed carefully. For I enunciate no new doctrine. I say what Daniel Webster said when the Mexican war was on at full tilt—that it is the right of the people of this country to determine for themselves whether there has been a sufficient grievance for the people to incur all of the burdens and risks that go with the entrance into war."

DISCUSSION OF SPEECH.

For the purposes of this report I shall pass over that part of Senator LA FOLLETTE'S address which describes his personal services in the West, or give his views concerning the financing of the war, and deal only with that portion which speaks of the causes leading up to the war and of our motives for entering it.

Seven different times in less than two pages of printed matter, with little variation, he tells his audience in substance either that we went to war to establish the right of an American citizen to travel upon the high seas on a foreign-owned munition-laden ship or that he did not believe that we should have gone into the war for that "poor privilege." And each time he uses this language the stenographic reports of the speech show that his sentiments were met by the audience with "laughter, cheers, and applause" or "with cheers and applause," clearly indicating the influence of his statements upon his audience. Either they believed his statement that the United States had gone to war for this "poor privilege" and applauded it because they did not think it sufficient cause for war, or they knew it was not true and approved this slander upon the Government. Whatever may have been the reason for these demonstrations, the effect of the speech was wholly vicious.

Again he says:

"Mr. President, it has sometimes occurred to me that the shippers of munitions of war, who are making enormous profits out of the business, should not have encouraged American citizens to ride on those ships in order to give a sort of semblance of safety to the passage of their profiteering cargoes abroad."

And again the sentiment is met with "applause." What inference can be drawn except that it was the intention of the speaker to make it appear to his audience that the manufacturers of munitions were in fact encouraging American citizens to ride on those ships in order to give a semblance of safety to their business? What proof can be adduced for such an assertion? Everyone knows that Senator LA FOLLETTE was opposed to entering the war, but that was no reason why he should misrepresent the attitude of the President or of 82 Senators and of 373 Congressmen who voted in favor of a declaration of a state of war. Why should he seek thus to discredit the cause of America? Is not the Senate interested in finding out?

Again he says:

"If all it (the Nation) has got at stake is the loans the house of Morgan makes to foreign Governments and the profits that munition makers will earn in shipping their products to foreign countries, then I think it ought to be weighed not in a common hay scales but in an apothecary's scales."

And this sentiment again is met with applause. What was the purpose in making this statement? Of course, the Senator does not say that all we had at stake was the loans of the house of Morgan to foreign Governments and the profits munition makers were earning in shipping their products to foreign countries, but that is the impression he leaves with his audience; and who will pretend to say that any proof exists anywhere that these were the only issues at stake when we entered the war?

Again he says:

"Four days before the Lusitania sailed President Wilson was warned in person by Secretary of State Bryan that the Lusitania had 6,000,000 rounds of ammunition on board, besides explosives, and that the passengers who proposed to sail on that vessel were sailing in violation of a statute of this country, that no passengers should travel upon a railroad train or sail upon a vessel which carried dangerous explosives."

And the sentiment is applauded.

The facts so far as the committee is now advised concerning them are: Mr. Bryan says that he had no knowledge that there were any munitions aboard this vessel until some days after it had been sunk, and he, therefore, could not have made the statement credited to him. I am informed that if put to the proof Senator LA FOLLETTE would claim that he had been so told by a newspaper reporter in whose statements he had full faith.

The statute alleged to have been violated is section 8005, and it provides that:

"It shall not be lawful to take, carry, or have on board of any such steamship or other vessel any nitroglycerine, dynamite, or any other explosive or compound, nor any vitriol or like acids, nor gunpowder, except for the ship's use, nor any article or number of articles, whether as a cargo or ballast, which, by reason of the nature or quantity or mode of storage thereof, shall, either singly or collectively, be likely to endanger the health or lives of the passengers or the safety of the vessel," etc.

There was a large amount of small-arm munitions aboard, but the Commerce Department has held that this statute did not prevent the shipment of small-arm munitions, because they are not held to be dangerous explosives within the meaning of this section. There were empty shells aboard, but they did not contain either charges or fuses.

The committee was not advised that the passengers had any knowledge of the presence of small-arm munitions, and even if they had there was no statute preventing their sailing because of these munitions; and if they had sailed with this knowledge, surely that can not be a reason why Germany, by her submarines, without notice and without warning, should sink the vessel, thereby causing the death of innocent men, women, and children aboard her.

The Senator from Wisconsin has been in public life for many years. He has been a Member of the Senate since 1905.

Presumably he heard the various messages to the Congress delivered by the President discussing Germany's aggressions during the prewar period.

Presumably he was familiar with the notes exchanged between our Government and the German Imperial Government.

Presumably he knew that with the German note of May 4, 1916, promising that merchant vessels would not be sunk without warning and without saving human lives, the Lusitania disaster was practically a closed incident.

Presumably he was familiar with the causes which led up to the war, and yet, with all the prestige of a long service in the Senate at the Capital of the Nation, he tells his audience that we went to war "for the poor privilege of establishing the right of an American citizen to travel upon a foreign-owned vessel loaded with munitions of war." He wholly ignores the real causes which led to the war, and which I have in part detailed in the earlier part of this report. He ignores the fact that a compliance with the German Imperial Government's order of January 31, giving notice that after February 1, 1917, all vessels which appeared in the war zone would be sunk, would, if put in effect, deny to 110,000,000 of people a foreign commerce aggregating $6,000,000,000 annually.

What excuse has the Senator from Wisconsin made for these statements? I have heard none. What must have been the effect upon his audience? The transcript of his speech shows that these particular parts of it were punctured with applause. Were those who applauded disloyal at heart, or were they ignorant of the real causes of our having gone to war and agreed with him that we did not have cause for entering the war?

Presumably there were in this audience men and women of all classes and shades of opinion, men who constituted a part of the military and naval forces of the United States, as well as those who were older or younger—parents, perhaps, of boys who had gone to the front to serve their country. What effect would such language have upon these people gathered together for the purpose of hearing a message from the Capital of the Nation?

If it were true that we only went to war for the purpose of establishing the right of an American citizen to sail on a munition-laden, foreign-owned vessel, without warning and without caring for the safety of passengers and crew, it would have been justified, but does anyone feel that the war would have received the same united and enthusiastic support given to it by the American people? If young men of military age were in the audience, who were about to be called to arms, would not their ardor have cooled if they believed his speech? If the fathers and mothers of these young men were present, might they not have been persuaded that they ought not to be asked to make so great a sacrifice as the war would entail for "that poor privilege"? Would not it have helped to arouse their indignation? Would not its natural effect have been to cause "insubordination" or acts of "disloyalty" or "failure of duty" if an attempt were made to compel young men to go into the service for such a cause? Would it not have tended to obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of that service? Men usually intend what they say. In peace-loving America my belief is that the less the cause for war the less will be the enthusiasm for it.

If these statements had been made by one who was not accustomed to public speaking, or by a private individual who did not appear upon the platform in the habiliments of his office, less serious consequences might be expected to follow. But when one of the Senators of a great Commonwealth, exercising the functions of his office, appears upon the platform to discuss in the presence of his fellow citizens such commanding questions as the cause of the war, while we are in the midst of preparations for it, we must not overestimate or underestimate the weight of his words.

These statements could not have been made by accident or slip of the tongue, because the same thought, if not the very same language, is repeated several times within the space of a few minutes.

Counsel for Senator LA FOLLETTE, in his argument before the committee, had much to say on the subject of freedom of speech. I yield to no one in my desire to preserve this right in its entirety; but he has cited the committee to no authority, and Senators will look in vain for any authority which makes freedom of speech a shield by which the speaker may protect himself from the consequences of misstatement. Freedom of speech can not be pleaded in defense to justify the slander of the chastity of a woman or the honor of a man, or the cause of a country when in the throes of the most terrific war ever waged.

That this speech shocked the loyal and patriotic people of Minnesota is evidenced by the fact that the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety, composed of the governor of that great State and eminent citizens associated with him, presented to the Senate a memorial in which it was recited that the Senator from Wisconsin had made an "address of a disloyal and seditious nature at a public meeting before a large audience." * * * And that "the utterances of Senator LA FOLLETTE, with all the prestige of his high office as a Senator of the United States * * * have already served to create treasonable sentiments in the State of Minnesota, and being spread through the public press, can have no other effect than to weaken the support of the Government in carrying on the war."

The evidence is not all before the committee of the Senate. I do not say in the present state of the record that Senator LA FOLLETTE should be expelled from the Senate, or that he should be convicted of a criminal offense under section 3 of the espionage act; but I do say that applying the principles of criminal law which are known to every lawyer, a grand jury inquiring into the case, with no other evidence before it than the speech itself, and the facts as in this report cited, would have been justified in returning an indictment against him for violation of the espionage law. And I further say that with this evidence, and none other, before a petit jury, it would have been justified in returning a verdict of guilty under this section of the statute, and no court would have disturbed it.

If there is any reasonable explanation which can be made of these utterances which would tend to prove an innocent purpose, such explanation ought to be given to the end that no injustice may be done, and that it may not be charged that the United States Senate passes lightly over wrongful speech by Senators while others are criminally prosecuted for offenses, in my judgment, no less severe.

Assume, for the sake of the argument, that United States Senators should have appeared in every important community within our borders and made like speeches. What would have been the effect upon the morale of the country? Could anything have been more gratifying to the heart of the German Kaiser? Would not such speeches have given some "aid and comfort" to the enemy?

Thus far I have discussed the facts, as I understand them, as if the speech were made in violation of the provisions of a criminal statute. Whether this is true or not is of little consequence so far as the duty of the Senate is concerned. The effect of the language upon the Senator's audience was the same, whether the language was within the inhibitions of a Federal statute or not. The effect upon their morale was the same. Men in peace-loving America do not willingly go to war unless there is found to be an urgent necessity for it. The rights and privileges of a private citizen should be and are guarded by the limitations of the written law, but the propriety or the impropriety of a Senator's utterances ought not alone to be determined by its limitations. I submit that a United States Senator ought to be more circumspect in his public speech before his fellow citizens who are in private life; and he ought not to give utterance to statements of fact which mislead people in time of war, whether his utterances infringe the criminal law or not.

I submit that men in high places should not either by word or deed so demean themselves as to lead from the path of duty those less well informed. Who can doubt the statement of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety that the effect of the speech was to create treasonable sentiment in the State? Men usually intend the natural consequences of their utterances and of their acts.

It is true that the Committee on Privileges and Elections does not have all the testimony before it. It has no word from the Senator from Wisconsin which even tends to modify or explain away the natural effect of his utterances, save that he can substantiate every statement made in the speech, that he believed in their accuracy at the time they were made, and still believes them to be correct.

It is not the purpose of this report to prejudge the case, because the evidence has not as yet been completed. The views herein expressed are, of course, subject to such modification as a fuller hearing might require. All I mean to say is that in the present state of the record I am perfectly clear that there should be a full and complete hearing to the end—

First. That the Senator from Wisconsin can be completely exonerated if the testimony justifies it.

Second. That he may be expelled if the testimony justifies it.

Third. That the Senate may pass a vote of censure or administer such other punishment as the testimony may justify.

This, in my judgment, is a duty which we owe to the Senator from Wisconsin, to the United States Senate itself, and to the public. More we ought not to do, and less we can not be expected to do.

ATLEE POMERENE.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, the report of the committee presenting the resolution which has been read to the Senate contains a copy of the entire speech that was made by Senator LA FOLLETTE; it has been laid before the Senate, and I presume has been read by everybody. In view of the situation in the Senate, the fact that this matter has been brought up at this time by the courtesy of the chairman of the committee in charge of the pending legislation, I am perfectly willing that the vote of the Senate shall be taken upon the resolution without any further explanation on the part of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. On agreeing to the resolution, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not quite understand what the proposition is that is now being presented to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Vermont, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 360), as follows:

Resolved, That the resolutions of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety petitioning the Senate of the United States to institute proceedings looking to the expulsion of ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE from the Senate, because of a speech delivered by him at St. Paul, Minn., on September 20, 1917, be, and the same hereby are, dismissed for the reason that the speech in question does not justify any action by the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have a few words to say about that. If I understand that resolution, it means that the fault committed by the Senator from Wisconsin in his St. Paul speech is to be passed over by the Senate without animadversion or criticism. Am I correct?

Mr. President, as I read the speech made by the Senator from Wisconsin in St. Paul, it was a series of false statements, and not only a series of false statements but a series of false statements which must have been consciously made. I find in that speech a charge that the United States went to war to protect "Morgan interests" of some sort or other. I find in that speech a charge that we went to war and sacrificed our children in order that rich Americans might ride on British munition-armed ships. I do not think I have misunderstood the speech as quoted in the report. I do not think I misread it the day after it was published. It is an everlasting lie that these United States went to war in order to protect any Morgan interests or any capitalistic interests of any sort. It is also an everlasting lie that the people of these United States ever sent their boys to be fed as cannon fodder in Europe in order that American citizens might ride upon munition ships. It is an everlasting lie that the Lusitania was armed or had dangerous explosives aboard, and that any law of the United States was ever violated by any American citizen who took passage upon the Lusitania. It is an everlasting lie that the 114 American citizens—men, women, and children—who went to their graves unknelled and unsung upon that memorable day of German barbarity went there to uphold the doctrine of capitalism, or of money-making, or of the right to protect a foreign ship under a foreign flag by American citizenship while it was carrying dangerous explosives.

I for one do not want the history of the United States to be written so that my children or grandchildren shall read that I sat quietly still while the United States Senate said that all that made no difference. I have seen ignorant boys arrested and tried and condemned, some few of them to death and some more of them to prison, for doing things and saying things that amounted to much less than this St. Paul speech.

I have no personal animosity to the Senator from Wisconsin, and he knows it. I have been good to him in days that have gone by, and he knows it; but I have no glad hand of welcome to extend to any enemy of my country when my country is in war, and I have no glad hand of welcome to extend to any man that slanders my country, that tells falsehoods about it, and I do not care whether he is a Senator or whether he is a plowboy, except that I can forgive the plowboy because of his ignorance.

Here we were engaged in a great war for the defense of the civilization and the liberty of the world. Every boy that could go went, or nearly every one—a whole lot of them, at any rate—except the few who were poisoned by this sort of literature. Is it to be said, for all time to come, that a Senator of the United States is to be held absolutely blameless while he announces to the world that my boys and your boys, some of them died, some of them were crippled, and some of them came back happily home, while they fought for the civilization of the world—is it to be held that he is blameless because he is not a plowboy when he says that we went to war "in the Morgan interest," when he says that we went to war in order that men might secure safe passage upon munition ships, in order that we might protect explosives by putting passengers aboard? Is it to be considered for one minute that he is blameless and that we have nothing to do with his utterances when he not only asserts that, but asserts more than that?

He asserts, in effect, that the American Republic has been guilty of hypocrisy and cowardice, and especially of hypocrisy; that it has gone to the Old World with the word in its mouth that it was fighting for the liberty of the world and for the democracy of the world and to make democracy safe in the world, when, as a matter of fact, it was fighting for "the Morgan interest," or it was fighting for a safe place for a ship on the ocean carrying high explosives protected by the presence of American women and children! Then he goes a little bit further in that speech at St. Paul, and he has the audacity to say that Mr. Bernstorff, as ambassador from Germany, gave us notice to keep off the ship. Gave us notice!—gave us! Who in the devil are we? We are the American people, under the providence of God. This little miserable Kaiser, who has since been dethroned to the gratification of the entire world, gave us notice, through his ambassador, that we might be hurt if we went on this ship, and then we were guilty of audacity and folly and insanity because we went on the ship, and 114 American citizens—most of them women and children—did not have cowardice enough to take the German warning and keep off the ship and went down unknelled and unsung and unshriven, and went down as Americans do go down, thank God, not a man of them deserting his post; every man giving place to a woman or child; every member of the crew, although they were British—but they speak English all the same—giving place to a woman or a child; all of them went down.

My children are to believe, and their children's children are to believe, that this Senate is going to pass over this thing in silence; that it was perfectly allowable for a man, provided he was a United States Senator, to say that these men, women, and children had no business there; they had no place there; they ought to have taken the warning of the German ambassador; they ought to have been scared by the German Kaiser; they ought to have been cowards, and not Americans!

Oh, Mr. President, I do not understand that. Maybe it is because I am more or less of a barbarian, something of a southerner in my ways; but I do not understand that. I do not understand why giving me a warning that I will be murdered if I go where I have a right to be ought to keep me from going there. I will go, so help me God! I will go every morning before breakfast and every night before I go to bed, and I believe I would go quicker after you told me that I should not than I would if you had not told me so.

Oh, this speech in St. Paul! I do not know what the Senator thought. I have begun to believe that he does not think; that if he thought anything at all, he thought that the self-seekers, the sloth lovers, the peace worshipers, the men and women who are willing to give up everything in the world in order that they may have a nice, easy time, would finally control America, and that somehow or other he or somebody else advocating that sort of doctrine would come out in front.

There is a peculiar thing about humanity, Mr. President, and that is this: In its ordinary days it loves pleasure. I understand why it loves it. I love it more than anybody. But when the days of crises come, the great days that invoke the human soul, the ordinary man rises above the measure which the Senator from Wisconsin meted out to him. He becomes inspired as by the voice of God running through all the history of the world. He sacrifices himself, his property, his children—and above all, his children—that is the hardest part of it. He is willing to see it all go into the melting pot rather than that anything false should exist. God calls to him from the depths—de profundis—and he answers with his whole soul; and, answering with his whole soul, he has no patience—not only not a little patience but no patience at all—for any man who makes this appeal to his ordinary, everyday life. He rises above it all. He becomes the son of God. Nine years out of ten, or ninety-nine out of one hundred, he does not know that he is the son of God; but in those peculiar days he does know it, and he knows that he would not fight for "the Morgan interests," nor for "capitalistic enterprise," and that he would not fight and that he would not die and that he would not sacrifice his children for any of the base purposes mentioned in that speech of the Senator from Wisconsin at St. Paul.

It is given to all of us, Mr. President, just about once in our lifetime, to rise to the heights. That time was given to all of us during this war; and those of us who did not rise to the heights were just common clay, miserably common clay, devil-impulsed common clay; and those who could rise to the heights rose, and the American people as a whole rose. There were traitors, of course. There were profiteers, of course.

Men generally may be likened to animals of some sort or other. One is like a lion, another is like a fox, another is like a wolf, another is like a vulture; and when you come to measure them up at a great time like the breaking out of the Civil War—especially in the South, even more than in the North, but in both sections—and when you come to measuring men at this time, you find out where the man is. There is the watchdog, the English-mastiff man; the Newfoundland, who rushes to the rescue of home, the watchdog of the household. Nine-tenths of the American people resemble him. Then there comes a vulture, who swoops down and tries to get some little bit of carrion out of what is left, somehow, and who tries to feed himself and his little vulture family with it all. Then there is another type for which the animal kingdom does not present any analogy, because no wolf was ever unfaithful to wolves; no fox was ever unfaithful to foxes; no vulture, even, was ever unfaithful to vultures. We come to the disloyal among human beings, for whom there is no analogy in animal life at all.

You, the Senator from Vermont, the author of this resolution—a gentleman from the soles of his feet to the top of his head, every inch of him—you, by this resolution, are attributing to yourself the idea that that sort of thing is to go on unscathed, unblemished, uncriticized, and unpunished.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I want to say that the Committee on Privileges and Elections had the resolutions of the Minnesota society under consideration for 14 months. They had before them the whole speech as reported by that committee, and the whole speech that was furnished to them by the Senator from Wisconsin, as reported by another reporter. They considered the whole speech, rather than the fragment which has been discussed by the Senator from Mississippi here to-day. They examined it in the light of every circumstance that was advanced. They had a compilation of authorities that was prepared, as I understand, in the Department of Justice, which covered the entire question, and the opening passage of which was that the whole speech should be read, because undoubtedly the tenor of the speech tends to throw light upon the intent with which certain statements which are challenged were uttered. Among other things the Senator, after stating that there was something wrong with our Government, said—and then follows what has been quoted from so freely here to-day.

Now, what I want to say to the Senator, in answer to his personal appeal to me, is that after having considered that at repeated meetings for 14 months, examining the whole question from the standpoint of lawyers and from the standpoint of precedent, the vote of that committee in recommending that the resolution of the Minnesota society be dismissed was entirely nonpartisan. It was 9 to 2. There were 11 members of the committee present; and the vote was nonpartisan, too, because the majority of voters consisted of Messrs. REED, VARDAMAN, WOLCOTT, ASHURST, DILLINGHAM, KENYON, SHERMAN, KNOX, and KELLOGG.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, every whole must be made up out of its several parts. I imagine that the Senator from Vermont will not accuse me of any inaccuracy in any quotation that I have made from the speech made at St. Paul by the Senator from Wisconsin. I do not care about how a blacksnake smothers a bird over with its slime before it swallows it. I want to know about the slime; I want to know about the poison; I want to know about the swallowing which is coming first. The Senator does not deny, the Senator will not deny, that in the speech made by the Senator from Wisconsin at St. Paul were these assertions to which I have referred, and which are a calumny and a slander upon the American people, and upon my boys who fought in France, and upon Theodore Roosevelt's boys who fought in France, and upon everybody else's boys who fought there. It is an everlasting falsehood to state that we entered this war for the reason stated by the Senator from Wisconsin in his St. Paul speech.

Now, I do not care about the Senator's telling me that it took 14 months to measure up this speech as a whole. It has not taken me more than about 56 minutes to measure up the parts of it as parts, and they are sufficiently objectionable; and they were meant; they were not accidental. They were the deliberate judgment of the man who made the speech, and he has not yet apologized for them, and he will not. He has not the moral courage to do it. There it is. There is the statement—apology for the sinking of the Lusitania on the ground that they were forewarned, and that Bryan had made a statement to the effect that the Lusitania had explosives on it, and it turns out that that is false. Bryan never said anything of the sort. That is a lie, too. The Senator from Wisconsin either knew Bryan never said anything of the sort or he was speaking without sufficient information, and I take it that he was speaking without sufficient information. There is this difference between a falsehood and a lie: A falsehood is a false statement of fact when you do not know it is false; a lie is a false statement of fact when you do know that it is false. It does not make any difference to me which one of these two theories shall prevail about these particular utterances in that particular speech.

I do not care whether the next balance of power in the Senate between Democrats and Republicans is held by the slender vote of one or not. That is not disturbing me. I say that speech at St. Paul was disloyal in spirit, disloyal in words, disloyal in intendment, disloyal in effect, and disloyal with a set purpose. I say here standing on my two feet—there is not much to me, not much physically, intellectually, or morally, the poor weak creature that God made me, and perhaps that God ought to regret having made—I can not understand it in any other way, and I am not going to let my children and grandchildren misunderstand my attitude toward this resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. I understand that if he were present he would vote the same way I would, and therefore I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is not recorded.

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island. In view of his absence, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, I do not see in the Chamber. I will ask if he has voted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas, and therefore will be compelled to withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON], who is detained on account of sickness.

Mr. LODGE. I am informed that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], if present, would vote as I intend to vote. So I vote "yea."

THE CENSUS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. FRANCE resumed the speech begun by him yesterday. Before the conclusion of the speech,

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have been very much impressed with the arguments of the Senator from Maryland, and with his presentation of his very comprehensive amendments. I think that there are many meritorious features about them, and I am entirely willing to have them adopted by the Senate and go to conference, in order that they may be thoroughly studied. Therefore I shall say that the amendments are accepted, and I hope the Senator will now offer them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendments will be accepted.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to offer several amendments to the bill, and as the amendments, while they are quite numerous, really constitute one amendment, I desire that they shall be read at the desk together without reference to the parts of the bill to which they apply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendments.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the title and wherever it occurs in the bill strike out the word "decennial" and insert in lieu thereof the word "quinquennial."

On page 1, strike out all of line 1 to line 2 on page 2, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That a census and survey of the population of the United States and of its colonies and of the education, health, insurance, agriculture, manufacture, forestry and forest products, mines and quarries of the people of the United States and of its colonies shall be taken by the Director of the Census, beginning in the year 1920, and every five years thereafter: Provided, however, That the taking of the census, registration, and schedule of inquiries relating to population shall be continuous, as hereinafter provided.

"The census herein provided for shall include each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Guam, and Samoa, said census to be made in accordance with such plans and regulations as the Director of the Census may prescribe in pursuance of the provisions of this act."

On page 2 strike out all of section 2 and substitute therefor the following:

"SEC. 2. That the period of three years, beginning the 1st day of July next preceding the census provided for in section 1 of this act, shall be known as the quinquennial census period, and the reports upon the inquiries provided for in said section shall be completed and published within such period: Provided, however, That the registration of the population and the schedule of inquiries relating thereto shall be commenced on or before the 1st day of July, 1919, and shall thereafter be continuous, and the results of the same shall be continually recorded and shall be from time to time compiled and analyzed, and useful statistics based thereupon published, as the public interest may require, but at intervals not longer than five years: Provided, however, That information identifying any particular individual or firm shall not be published but shall be held in confidence: Provided, however, That lists of all citizens over 21 years of age, arranged and divided into sections according to election precincts, districts, counties, congressional districts, and States, which lists shall contain information as to the race, sex, occupation, and residence of each such inhabitant over 21 years of age, shall be published on or before the 1st day of July in each year, such lists to be known as the "official Federal registration lists," and to be printed for distribution in sections as described at such reasonable prices as may be determined upon by the Director of the Census."

On pages 8, 9, 10, and 11 strike out all of section 8 and substitute therefor the following:

"SEC. 8. That the Fourteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to the education, health, insurance, agriculture, manufacture, forestry and forest products, mines and quarries of the people of the United States and the colonies, and to the population of the United States and its colonies.

"The survey and schedules of inquiries and the records relating to population shall be so made as to furnish continuing records of each inhabitant, which records shall be kept by complete card system, in duplicate, one set of records to be filed in the census office of the local subdivision and one set to be filed in the office of the Bureau of Census in Washington when it shall be called for. Such continuous survey and records of the inhabitants of the United States shall be so made as to furnish an accurate schedule of vital, educational, and industrial statistics as a basis for the formulation of legislation to promote the general welfare, defense, and safety by improving the vital, educational, and industrial condition of the inhabitants, and such survey and records shall include specifically and in detail for each and every inhabitant, the place and date of birth; acute and chronic contagious diseases; occupational diseases and accidents; school attendance and progress; business or vocational training; military training or service and wounds or disabilities contracted in service; high-school, college, or technical training; health and physical condition; the health and physical condition of all school children under 14 years of age, and of all males under 45 years of age, as ascertained by an annual medical examination; place, character, sanitation, and tenure of abode; relationship to head of the family; color; sex; age; conjugal condition; occupation; condition of employment or unemployment; registration in Federal employment agency; whether employer or employee; trade; business; public offices, honors or special achievements; payment of taxation or insurance premiums; whether qualified and habitually exercising suffrage rights in State and Federal elections; place of birth of parents, nationality, and mother tongue, and knowledge of English if born in a foreign country; nationality, mother tongue, and knowledge of English of parents of foreign birth, and number of years in the United States; literacy; and the date, place, and cause of death; and such schedules shall also include a survey of the almshouses, charitable agencies, and complete and partial pauperism in the United States.

"The survey of and schedule of inquiry relating to education shall be so made as to secure such definite and classified information as might be useful as a basis for the formulation of legislation for the establishment of a Federal department of public education and for the standardization and extension, with the aid of the Federal Government, of all of the agencies of public instruction and for the establishment of a federalized system of free public education and training extending from the elementary schools to and including technical schools, colleges, universities, and professional schools with vocational and rehabilitation schools as well as night schools for adults and immigrants, compulsory in its elementary but optional for and equally available to all in its higher departments; and such schedule of inquiry shall include a survey of the number, character, cost, and value of city and rural public-school buildings for the white and racial groups; of private, technical, and rehabilitation schools; of colleges, universities, and professional schools; salaries of teachers and the total annual cost of maintenance; the total number of children of school age; the number enrolled, the number in regular attendance, and the length of the school year; sanitary conditions; character of curricula and physical and mental training; tuition and living costs in private schools and colleges; and the possible availability of private institutions, schools, and colleges for acquisition for future or continued use as parts of a public system of education.

"The survey and schedule of inquiry relating to the public health and of insurance shall be so made as to secure such definite and classified information as might be useful as a basis for the formulation of legislation for the establishment of an efficient Federal department of public health, vital statistics, and insurance and for the standardization and extension of all of the various existing public-health agencies and for the promotion of rational insurance systems, particularly with the purpose of limiting the ravages of tuberculosis and other communicable diseases and of preventable industrial accidents and diseases and the destitution due to preventable injury, death, and inadequate insurance, and such schedules of inquiry shall include a survey and tabulation of vital statistics and of the health of the population as reported by the population registration records heretofore provided for; also a survey of public and private health bureaus or agencies; of public and private hospitals and sanitoria for general or special diseases; of contagious and industrial diseases; of industrial accidents; safety devices, sanitary precautions, morbidity and mortality in the dangerous and dusty trades; of tenements and insanitary housing conditions; of employers' liability laws, and of systems in force of health, old-age, accident, or other forms of insurance, with cost of same and the distribution and number of those insured: And provided, That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission on education of three members and a commission on public health, vital statistics, and insurance of three members to advise with the Director of the Census as to the most efficient methods of collecting and classifying data relating to these subjects, and each member of said commissions may be granted a salary at the rate of $5,000 per annum for the term of his service, which shall not exceed three years.

"The schedules relating to agriculture shall include name, color, sex, and country of birth of occupant of each farm, tenure, acreage of farm, acreage of woodland, value of farm and improvements, and the encumbrance thereon, sanitary condition, value of farm implements, number and breeding of live stock on farms, ranges, and elsewhere, and the acreage of crops and the number working, including family, in crop production, and the net and gross income, the quantities and cost, including value of the labor of farmer and family or crops and other farm products for the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration. Inquiries shall be made as to the quantity of tilled and tillable land and of land reclaimed and reclaimable by irrigation and drainage and the crops produced; also as to the location and character of irrigation and drainage enterprises, and the capital invested in such enterprises.

"The schedules of inquiries relating to manufacturers and to mines and quarries shall include the name and location of each establishment; character of organization, whether individual, corporate, or other form; character of business or kind of goods manufactured; amount of capital actually invested; number of proprietors, firm members, copartners and officers, and the amount of their salaries; number of employees and hours of labor, and the amount of their wages; sanitary conditions and health preservation methods, and pension or profit-sharing systems; quantity and cost of materials used in manufactures; principal miscellaneous expenses; quantity and value of products; time and operation during the year; character and quantity of power used; and character and number of machines employed.

"The census of manufactures and of mines and quarries shall relate to the year ending December 31, next preceding the enumeration of population, and shall be confined to manufacturing establishments and mines and quarries which were in active operation during all or a portion of that year. The census of manufactures shall furthermore be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as a factory system, exclusive of the so-called neighborhood, household, and hand industries.

"The form and subdivision of inquiries necessary to obtain the information under the foregoing topics shall be determined by the Director of the Census.

"Whenever he shall deem it expedient the Director of the Census may charge the collection of these statistics upon special agents or upon detailed employees to be employed without respect to locality."

On pages 11 and 12, strike out all of section 9 and substitute therefor the following:

"SEC. 9. That the Director of the Census, at least six months prior to the date fixed for commencing the schedules of inquiries and the enumeration as herein provided, shall designate the number, whether one or more, of supervisors of census for each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Guam, and Samoa, or special agents as hereinafter provided, and shall define the various census districts, census subdivisions of the census districts, and the census precincts in which they are to act: Provided, That the supervisors of the census shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That so far as possible the boundaries of the census districts shall conform to the boundaries of congressional districts, and the boundaries of the various census subdivisions shall conform to the political subdivisions of the States or colonies, such as counties, cities, or legislative districts, and that the census precincts shall conform to the election precincts of such political subdivisions: And provided further, That, if in any supervisor's census district the supervisor has not been appointed and qualified 90 days preceding the date fixed for the survey and enumeration, or if any vacancy shall occur, either through death, removal, resignation, or from any other cause, the President may appoint a temporary supervisor or director of the census district or the Director of the Census may detail any employee of the Census Office to act as a supervisor of the district: And provided further, That each supervisor of the census shall select, with the approval and consent of the Director of the Census, a suitable office in each of the census precincts of each of the various census subdivisions of each of said census districts, to be created as heretofore provided, to which office on census enumeration days, which shall be duly specified and publicly proclaimed by the President, all of the inhabitants of said census precinct shall come either in person or through the head of the family, parent, teacher, or head of the firm by which he may be employed, to be enrolled and to receive a numbered registration card: And provided further, That the supervisor of the district shall, with the approval and consent of the Director of the Census, also select suitable central offices for each census subdivision corresponding to either city, country, or legislative district, if possible at the county seat or at some other central point where there shall be provided, until a suitable Federal building shall be erected, as may hereafter be provided by law, rooms and facilities for the study, tabulation, classification, and safe-keeping of all record cards containing vital statistics and other information provided by the schedules of inquiry: And provided further, That such central offices shall also be utilized for the accommodation of the subdivision branch of the Federal Department of Public Health, Vital Statistics, and Insurance; of the subdivision branch of the Federal Department of Education, and of the subdivision branch of the Federal Employment Bureau when and if these shall be authorized and created by Federal statutes. The Director of the Census shall also make regulations concerning the carrying by individuals, after they shall have been registered, of identification numbered registration cards: And provided further, That the supervisor in each census district shall select clerks, preferably residents of the census precinct, and preferably the State election or registration officials of the corresponding election district or precinct to act as clerks or enumerators in that corresponding census precinct for the making of the records in said precinct, and the supervisor of the census shall also name an assistant supervisor, and clerks to such assistant supervisor for each census subdivision who shall have supervision of the clerks and enumerators of the census precincts, and who shall receive, classify, and care for the records in the central offices of the census subdivisions and forward them as directed to the office of the Census Bureau in Washington: And provided further, That one properly qualified, regularly licensed physician shall be appointed as medical supervisor for each census precinct, and one such physician shall be appointed as medical director for each census subdivision, which medical supervisor and medical director shall assist in the collection and classification of all health and vital statistics for the census precinct and census subdivision, respectively, under regulations which shall be prescribed by the Director of the Census: And provided further, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and the heads of the various executive departments of the Government shall be charged with the making, through the offices of the Provost Marshal General, of the Surgeon General of the Army, of the Surgeon General of the Navy, or through other suitable agencies, of the schedules of inquiries relating to the men in the Army, the men in the Navy, and the employees in all of the various executive departments of the Government: And provided further, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to assist the Director of the Census by calling upon the governors of the various States and colonies and upon State, county, and city officials to promote the speed and accuracy of the census taking by permitting and, so far as may be, requesting or directing the heads of the State and city departments, educational authorities, heads of private schools and colleges, teachers, and school physicians to make the schedule of inquiries relating to all employees of the said departments and to children or students enrolled in the various educational institutions: And provided further, That the President be, and he is hereby, also authorized to seek the cooperation of the heads of railroads, public utility, commercial, and industrial enterprises in the making of schedules of inquiries relating to their employees: Provided, however, That the public-school teachers who make the schedule of inquiries relating to their pupils shall be, and others, as the Director of the Census may name, may be duly authorized as enumerators of the census and shall be paid for their work, receiving such compensation from the Census Bureau as the Director of the Census may determine."

On pages 12 and 13 strike out all of section 10 and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 10. That the Director of the Census shall also direct that inquiries shall be made through the supervisors of the various census districts and through the assistant supervisors of various census subdivisions as to the best available site in each census subdivision, in the town or city where the central offices of the census subdivision shall be located, for the erection of a Federal building for the permanent accommodation of the census subdivision offices, for the safe-keeping of records, and for the permanent housing of the subdivision branches of the Federal Departments of Education, of Health, Vital Statistics, and Insurance, of the Federal Employment Bureau, Agricultural Extension Services, and of the Post Office; and whether the local authorities or agencies will provide the site or what would be the price of the same, such site to be suitable for the erection of a building either by the Federal Government alone or in conjunction with the local authorities, which building shall be suitable for the aforesaid uses, with fireproof files for the population records, rooms and laboratories for physical examinations, rooms for corrective physical treatments, assembly hall, a library of United States bulletins and publications, the vocational or rehabilitation school, facilities for a Federal community center or such other activities as will best promote the Federal and local needs: Provided, That the results of these inquiries shall be tabulated and submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate for consideration by that committee: Provided further, That each supervisor of census shall be charged with the performance within his own district of the following duties: To consult with the Director of Census in regard to the division of his district into subdivisions most convenient for the purpose of enumeration, which subdivisions or enumeration districts shall be defined and the boundaries thereof fixed by the Director of the Census as heretofore provided; to designate to the director suitable persons, and with his consent to employ such persons as enumerators, one or more for each precinct and subdivision; to communicate to enumerators the necessary instructions and directions relating to their duties; to examine and scrutinize the returns of the enumerators, and in the event of discrepancies or deficiencies appearing in any of the said returns to use all diligence in causing the same to be corrected or supplied; to forward the completed returns of the enumerators to the director at such time and in such manner as shall be prescribed; and to make up and forward to the director the accounts of each enumerator in his district for service rendered, which accounts shall be duly certified to by the enumerator, and the same shall be certified as true and correct if so found by the supervisor, and said accounts so certified shall be accepted and paid by the director.

"The duties imposed upon the supervisor by this act shall be performed in any and all particulars in accordance with the orders and instructions of the Director of the Census."

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I confess that it is with a sense of diffidence, and I may say of responsibility, that I rise to discuss the amendments which I have proposed to the pending census bill. I realize perfectly well that this whole subject of the census is generally deemed to be a most technical one, and being technical, it is deemed to be a most uninteresting subject; but I think that, if I could secure the attention of the Senate to a real consideration of the amendments which I propose, the Senate would soon come to a realization that not only do these amendments to go to the very heart of the question as to the methods by which the census should be taken, but that they also go to the very heart of the theories upon which the modern census, at least, is based; and that these amendments go to the very heart of this great subject which confronts us in this reconstruction period, as to what are the legitimate functions of government and as to what are not.

I have very positive views upon this subject. Throughout my political experience I have always sought to be a liberal in politics, but I have sometimes been distressed to observe that many of the so-called progressives were not progressives, but that they were destructives; and, Mr. President, in my political thinking, while I have leaned toward liberalism, I have always sought to avoid destructivism.

I believe in the principles of this Republic, and therefore I am a Republican and not a democrat. I believe that the fathers clearly understood what were the proper functions that belong to government when they wrote the Constitution of the United States, and I think that they clearly understood also what functions did not and should not belong to government.

Mr. President, it seems to me that an important problem of the reconstruction period is to decide this question: What are the legitimate functions of government as it has been constituted in the United States?

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will pardon another personal reference. I have sought to be a liberal in politics, and it is for that reason that I am opposed to the assumption by the Government of functions which are nongovernmental. If I could take every liberal in the United States by the hand to-day, I would say to him: "You, who believe in progress and liberalism in government, should be warned by the experience, the painful experience of the last few months, as to the danger of transferring to the Government those functions which do not properly belong to government at all." I would ask such liberal to read this language, taken from an advertisement, evidently contributed by patriotic citizens, in the Buffalo Commercial. I am not sure as to the politics of that paper, but whether it is Democratic or Republican it must believe in the Republic and those great principles of republican government which lie underneath the very foundations of the Republic:

STATE SOCIALISM.

Human experience proves that every government, whether autocratic or democratic, seeks to extend its powers and increase its authority at the expense of the liberties of the governed.

We are witnessing to-day an attempt by the administrative branch of the United States Government to consolidate and perpetuate the powers conferred upon it in a time of war, although peace has returned.

Secretary Daniels wants to take over the radio systems of the country.

Secretary Burleson, placed in control of the telephone and telegraph lines as a war measure, has grabbed the cables since the armistice was signed and now coolly proposes Government ownership and operation for all of them.

Director General McAdoo pleads for five years of Government control of the railroads, well knowing that by the end of that time it would be well-nigh impossible to turn them back to their rightful owners.

We are headed straight for State socialism, a system that negatives all individual initiative, discourages private enterprise, and creates an oligarchy of officeholders and State employees to vote in or out of power that party that does or does not meet their demands in fullest measure for more pay or more favorable working conditions and hours.

This is the great issue of the day, and it is absolutely necessary that an intelligent body of public opinion be lined up behind our lawmakers if a national calamity is to be averted.

Every business man, everyone with money invested in an enterprise of any kind, every farmer or home owner, every young man with a future to look forward to, and older men who desire that their sons should be given an equal opportunity with the young men of the past are hereby invited to write to their Senators and Congressmen, respectively, protesting against any legislation which has for its purpose the socialization of any of this country's great business organizations.

State socialism means surrender to the Socialistic Party. That surrender, unless prevented, will eventually give control of the Government to the Bolsheviki.

Democratic leaders have gone on record as advocating Government ownership. We do not believe the Democratic masses will stand for this proposed sale of their party to the Socialists.

Mr. President, it has been interesting to me as being, I think, somewhat in touch with the liberal thought of this country to see the certainly changing attitude of the masses of the people in the United States toward the question of the assumption by the Government of functions which can not from any standpoint be considered to be functions which should properly inhere in the Government. They have seen the Postmaster General stretch out a hand and grasp the wires and cables of communication; they have seen that hand suppress the movement over those wires of news and of thought and of opinion. They have seen the menace involved in such governmental action. All of the thinking people of this country who are not satisfied with conditions are very much interested in securing news as to what is transpiring in Europe concerning the peace conference and as to what is transpiring in Russia, because, Mr. President, most definite and certain news seeping through various channels from Russia informs us that deliberate untruths have been told to the American people with reference to the situation there; and these people, desiring to understand the situation, have seen the danger of having an interested Government controlling the information which the people have a right to have in order that they may pass intelligent judgment as to what foreign policy is being considered and as to what policy may be presented to them later for their adoption.

In this connection I wish to quote from a paper which I rarely quote; a paper which, while representing the great press of the South, is unfortunately so partisan in its views that its judgments are very often biased. This newspaper was in favor of the espionage act. I do not know whether it was in favor of the seizure of the cables, but already it has come to the position where it realizes that all is not well with the Democratic administration so far as its seizure of the cables is concerned. This editorial is headed "An unfortunate incident." I will ask, Mr. President, to have it inserted in the RECORD. I will give the substance of it, so that there may be no lack of continuity in my discussion. It refers to the question of suppression of news with reference to the English proposition to deal constructively with the Russian question, and it asks this question:

Why should we have to learn from a Paris Socialist paper, L'Humanite, that the British Government proposed on the 3d of this month that representatives of the various Russian factions should be allowed to come to Paris and discuss with the great powers terms of a permanent settlement?

And so forth.

I ask that the entire editorial may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

AN UNFORTUNATE INCIDENT.

The first of President Wilson's 14 principles was a demand for open international covenants openly arrived at. Is that principle being discarded at the outset? The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald cables that American newspaper men are told every day there is nothing for publication and are kept in the dark, and he intimates that if any covenants are being made they are not being made in the open. Possibly this is an exaggeration or a misconception.

But why should we have to learn from a Paris socialistic paper, L'Humanite, that the British Government proposed on the 3d of this month that representatives of the various Russian factions should be allowed to come to Paris and discuss with the great powers terms of a permanent settlement? The statement of the exact character of the proposition differs. From the reply of the French minister of war, as given in L'Humanite, it was interpreted by the French Government as an invitation to the Bolsheviki to take part in the peace conference. As explained by our Mr. Polk, it was a call on all the Russian factions to suspend hostilities and send delegates to Paris with a view of adjusting their differences and restoring law and order in Russia. But no matter which statement more accurately describes the proposal, there can be no doubt that it was one of the first importance. Why was it not made public at once?

The American delegates at Paris say they knew nothing about it until M. Pichon's scathing rejection of the British suggestion was published in L'Humanite. And Mr. Polk, our Acting Secretary of State, did not give it out, supposing that the memorandum which had been handed him on the 3d of this month had also been submitted to President Wilson and our delegates in Paris. It was clearly so big a thing that Mr. Polk did not feel at liberty to divulge it without authority from Paris. And yet he was so absent-minded that when a correspondent interviewed him with regard to M. Pichon's statement he "did not connect the question with the proposal referred to in the memorandum received from the British charge," and denied that any such proposal had reached him.

The closer the adherence to President Wilson's principle of open diplomacy the better it will be for everybody. The British proposal may be entirely defensible—may be based on motives of justice and wisdom. But it has gotten a black eye to start with because it was kept secret. That makes it at once an object of suspicion, invests it with the aspect of intrigue and double-dealing. Everybody begins to read into it weakness or selfishness. The French politely explain it as a reversion to the old Lloyd-Georgian radicalism and to a fear of Bolshevism at home. Others, more cynical, think it looks to a bargain for the payment of the British debt, or for such a reconstruction of Russia into small States as will eliminate her as a future menace to British interests in Asia.

None of these suspicions might have been aroused had this preliminary "covenant" been posted on the peace conference bulletin board. As it is, we seem to start off with a failure to insist on our own first and fundamental principle.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I shall not discuss further at this time the other functions which I believe the Government, unnecessarily, improperly, and to the damage of the country and to the proper progress of the conduct of the war, has assumed. I wish rather to get back to my theme, which is that progressive government can not exist, that free government is menaced, when the Government begins to assume nongovernmental functions.

That does not mean, Mr. President, that I am what should be called a "stand-patter." I am dissatisfied with conditions in this Republic; I realize that there are legitimate reasons why there should be here profound unrest; but I believe that we can meet the problem by first deciding definitely what are government functions and what are not, and then by beginning reconstruction work, not with a trowel, but with an ax, in order that we may cut the Republic free from many of these bureaus which have been built up and release it from the performance of nongovernmental functions, while at the same time insisting that every proper governmental function shall be performed with the very utmost of efficiency.

The trouble in this country is not due to our governmental form. It is rather due to the fact that the Government has not been efficiently performing its legitimate governmental functions, and that there have not been enacted the laws which, under our growing social and economic complexity, are necessary in order that the great fundamental principles enunciated by the fathers might be applied to a condition totally unlike that which existed in their day, but, I believe, a condition which they foresaw; because there is not lacking in the Constitution, as I believe and as I hope later to show, authority for the performance of one of these great fundamental functions which are really the proper and legitimate functions of government, and because of the inadequate and inefficient and bureaucratic performance of which great evils have arisen in this country.

You may say, perhaps, that I am neither flesh nor fish. I believe in the Republic, but I believe in change under the Constitution. I believe in reform, legitimate reform. I believe in a rearrangement and a reorganization of the whole Republic along certain lines, without the assumption by the Republic of a single function which it is not performing to-day, and which it has not the legitimate and constitutional right to perform.

Mr. President, if the Senators will agree with me that the survey of the condition of the Republic, that the enumeration and enrollment of its inhabitants, that the examination of the condition of each inhabitant, of the condition of his health, of the condition of his literacy or of his illiteracy, of the condition of his employment or unemployment, and so forth, are a legitimate function of government, we can go together; and I fail to see how you can disagree, for the census clause is one of the first written into the fundamental, organic law of the Nation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRANCE. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. Referring to the last suggestion made by the Senator, does he think that the Government should act merely for the purpose of obtaining the desired, needful, and useful information, or for the purpose of aiding persons to secure employment, and also furnishing them employment, and embarking upon what might be termed a paternalistic industrial system? I ask because if it is the former, no one probably would disagree with him; if the latter, there might be a wide diversity of opinion.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator that there are several questions involved in his question.

What is paternalism? What does the father do? Does he bring his son into the world and keep him as an infant all his life? Does he weaken him and soften him by an undue amount of paternal protection? Sometimes he does, and the product is an unmoral product; it is an un-American product. But I would ask the Senator if it is a legitimate function of paternal care to see that the child is born under as good conditions as possible, and that the child, being so born, shall be given every possible security against destruction by contagious or infectious disease, and that he be given as good an opportunity as the next man to secure a thorough education to fit him for the race of life?

I think, without discussing all of the proper functions of paternal care, that we can agree that there are legitimate paternal functions and illegitimate ones. The Senator will admit, for example, referring to the whole subject of popular education, that there were men who contended at one time that the establishment of popular education was paternalism. From what I know of the Senator from Utah and his views, I do not feel that we shall be very far apart upon that subject, although it is quite possible that from that undefined region which lies between legitimate and illegitimate paternalism I might select certain functions for the Government to perform which he would not select. But I think, so far as our fundamental conceptions are concerned, that he and I are in entire agreement; and I am making an effort to differentiate, if possible, between what I consider to be legitimate governmental functions, or, if you please, paternalistic functions—because all of the duties of governments are paternalistic in one sense—and what may be considered illegitimate governmental functions.

Certainly the census taking is a proper function. Do you believe that public education is a legitimate function of government? If you do, we go along together. I do not propose to give much time during the hours in which I shall discuss this subject to proving that popular education is a legitimate function of government, but I believe it is. If it is, give us education. Give us education for everybody. Give the poor boy as much education as the rich man can buy, and give it to him at the expense of the State. The failure to do this is one cause for unrest. Why should my boy, because I have a few thousand dollars a year, go to a great university, when he may be a blockhead, and get an education which the boy of my neighbor, who has not the money, can not get?

There, I will say to the Senator, is a border-line case. I believe that public education is a function of government; and, believing so, I do not believe that the Government can afford to try to highly educate a fool, nor do I believe it can afford to withhold from the brilliant young man the utmost education which he is capable of taking, regardless of his financial condition. Probably the Senator would say that that was one of the border-line questions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRANCE. I do.

Mr. KING. I concur with probably all that the Senator has said respecting the question of education, except that if he means that the Federal Government should assume the education of the children in the States I could not concur with him. I think that the sovereign States have resting upon them the responsibility of educating the children within their borders; and this duty they are performing with zeal and enthusiasm. I do not know of a single State that does not have a university in which the higher branches of education are taught, and taught freely, to all within the State.

I think if the Senator will go into the great universities of our country—and I do not want to indulge in any invidious comparison, but universities such as Yale and Harvard and Columbia——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And Michigan.

Mr. KING. And Michigan, certainly, as my distinguished friend from Michigan suggests; and I can speak with pleasure of that, because I attended that university—I think he will find more students who are the children of parents who possess but little or none of this world's goods than he will those whose parents possess wealth. It is a very common thing in these great educational institutions to find young men who work their way through college, because of their lack of means and the poverty of their parents. It is my observation that any young man in the United States who wants an education can obtain it, and it has not been denied him on account of poverty.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator has again mixed several questions in his reply. If he will go to Wisconsin University, for example, he will find a university which I believe—and the Senator from Wisconsin can correct me if I am misinformed on that subject—is really a part of the system of public education; but if he will go to certain other institutions which I could name—and I will not name them—he would find that very few poor boys are there.

Mr. KING. If the Senator means that in some States provision has not been made to give the children of the poor the highest education that may be given to the children of the rich within the State, that State has failed in the discharge of its duty.

Mr. FRANCE. I feel so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FRANCE. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may not be inappropriate to say that there are men within the sound of the voice of the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Utah who worked their way through a great educational institution. I do not happen to be one of them. I did not have the privilege of attending the University of Michigan. In fact, I had very little early education, because of the necessities of my situation; but my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND], who was equally poor and equally determined and much abler, worked his way through in the most humble employments, and there was no bar to him.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to call attention to the fact that although a university may provide free tuition, nevertheless it is not possible for every young man to work his way through the university. In many cases—a very large percentage of cases—he has dependents whom he must support, and it is not alone a question of making his own living while he is securing an education. Wisconsin University has recognized this, and has recognized it very substantially through its extension courses, whereby it seeks to provide for the boy at home who must be supporting dependents at that stage of his life a fair amount of higher education.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Michigan have opened up a very important subject, and the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin are quite applicable. I am not undertaking this afternoon to discuss the large question as to whether the States or the Federal Government should provide public education. I am merely laying down the proposition that if public education is a legitimate function of the Government, it must perform that function universally and fully; and it is not doing it——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FRANCE. Will the Senator permit me to proceed a moment? It is not doing it when we come to a great war and find that out of the 2,000,000 men called to defend the Republic against a violent and a most dangerous enemy 200,000, or 10 per cent, are illiterate. Our enemy had no illiteracy in his armies, because Frederick the Great had learned the value as a fighting man of the educated man, and, because he was both a capable and a ferocious military leader, he decided to educate his people. Does the Senator desire to defend a system of education which would force this great Republic, supposed to be the leader in enlightenment throughout the world, when exposed to such a deadly danger, to call 2,000,000 men to its defense and find 200,000 of them unable to read or write their names or to understand the orders which they must read in order to perform their duties in defending the Republic?

I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee with pleasure.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I can not let this opportunity pass to say that I agree most heartily and cordially with the propositions as to national aid to education that the Senator from Maryland is so well laying down. It is one of the remarkable things that this great, rich Government of ours, contributing millions and sometimes almost billions to other worthy purposes, practically furnishes nothing to the cause of education of the youth of our land.

I agree with the Senator entirely on this subject. I think our Government should see to it that there are no illiterates in this country. We should do away with illiteracy; and while it is primarily the duty of the States, if the States do not perform that duty it is our duty as a National Government, it is our duty as legislators, to furnish the necessary money and the necessary means to educate the youth of America.

I am for education. I am for any kind of an educational bill. I am about education somewhat like the old-fashioned Kentuckian used to be about his whisky. It was all good, better, and best, and there was no bad whisky. [Laughter.] And so I think about education. It is all good. Private education is good. State education is good. And national education is good. It is all good. It is all helpful.

I am for any kind of an educational measure. I am for the best, of course, if possible. If we can not get that, then I will take the good or the better kind of an educational measure. I indorse what the Senator has said on national aid to education. I was much interested in and strongly for the vocational education we provided for some time ago. I was even more in favor, if that could be possible, of the educational rehabilitation of our wounded and maimed soldiers as provided for by us recently. And it would give me the greatest pleasure to support some general scheme of national aid to the cause of the general education of our youth. I hope some general plan can be agreed to so that the greatest, richest, and most powerful Nation on earth can also be the best educated.

Mr. FRANCE. I thank the Senator; and I would say that I am not raising a sectional question, because there are strict constitutionalists on that side of the Chamber who feel exactly as I do. Indeed, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has introduced a measure which, while it does not entirely meet with my views as to the best method, expresses purposes which are entirely in accord with the purposes which I have in mind, although the Senator from Georgia comes from a State which ordinarily would hold that the function of education belongs to the State rather than to the Federal Government.

But, Mr. President, I should be moving on.

Is the protection of the public health a legitimate function of Government? Well, I will only say the same thing—that if it is to the interest of State government and if it is to the interest of the Republic to protect in every legitimate and proper way the health of its citizens, then let us have a public-health system which will function, and function universally, and function scientifically.

I do not feel that any Senator can be in disagreement with the fundamental principles which I am laying down, so far as the social survey, public education, and the public health are concerned. Is the relief of unemployment, not in any paternalistic way, but in the way of bringing an unemployed man in New York, for example, in contact with an opening in Maryland, through the establishment of public-employment bureaus, a legitimate function of government? If it is, let us have public-employment bureaus which will function effectively.

Mr. President, if there are any men in this Chamber, let me say, who desire seriously to contend that any of these functions are not legitimate public functions, and that they are not legitimate functions of this Republic, then I will suggest to them that they had better resign from the Congress of the United States, or withhold in the future some of the votes which they have cast in the Congress of the United States; for every one of those functions is now being performed not only by the States but by the Federal Government as well; and I propose, later on in my discussion, to show that every one of those functions has not only been performed but that they can be legitimately performed; and I propose also to show that these very functions which the Federal Government has been performing during this war it can also legally perform during times of peace.

Mr. President, I desire to say, in passing, that these amendments which I have offered to the census bill are so fundamental, they open up such a large subject, not only the particular subject with which the amendments seem to deal, but the whole subject of reconstruction, as I have intimated before, and, indeed, the whole subject as to the legitimate and proper functions which government should perform, that, in view of the vastness of the subject, it would really take weeks of discussion to touch upon the most salient points. I am also very frank to say that if I felt that such a discussion by me of this subject, for weeks, would secure the serious and careful attention of the Senate to it, and favorable action upon these census amendments—which, of course, are only a part of a program of legislation which I have in mind—I would not hesitate one moment to stand here and talk until the 5th of March, until there should be an extra session to deal with these fundamental problems of reconstruction, with which, if we do not deal, we will invite a most dangerous situation in the country; and let me say that with all the emphasis which I can put upon it.

The people of this country are not satisfied, and I hope they never will be, with conditions as they are; for it is not proper that the citizens of this great Republic, which is to be the pioneer in government, which is to be the leader in the great procession down the ages toward a better and a more peaceful civilization of the world, should ever be satisfied. I hope they will always be filled with a divine discontent. I rejoice to-day that conditions in this country are such that we can not go back to where we were before; and if there be any in this Chamber or in this Congress or in any of the legislative halls of the United States who believe that reconstruction means restoration of the old conditions, then, indeed, such a man is blind, not only to conditions as they prevail in this country but blind also to the whole deep meaning of this mighty struggle in which the world is now engaged.

Mr. President, I have been attempting to make it clear that these amendments are designed as a step toward removing those conditions which are a legitimate cause for unrest and for discontent. They are designed to lay a foundation for reconstruction as broad as the teeming millions of our population in this country and in our colonies in the islands of the sea, and as deep as every individual need which can be properly met by any legitimate function of the Government.

Mr. President, I love my country better than my party, and I will follow the leadership of any man who has a practical plan for leading this country and the world out of the present wilderness.

As I have pondered upon the situation in which we find ourselves, not only in this country but in the world, I have thought sometimes that in this crisis in human affairs we have a leaderless country, a leaderless world. Ideals are not enough. They must be applied and conditions must be considered as they are and not as we would wish them.

The problems of this country can not solve themselves. While I find myself in agreement with many of the ideals expressed by the President, I have been forced to reach the conclusion that he has not appreciated conditions as they really exist, not only in this country but throughout the world.

I shall not now discuss the world conditions, although of course they properly belong to the great question of reconstruction, because I believe that our reconstruction should consider the problems of the world as well as the problems of this country. But so far as the problems of this country are concerned, certainly the President has not perceived them, because on December 2, in his farewell address, he said:

So far as our domestic affairs are concerned the problem of our return to peace is a problem of economic and industrial readjustment. That problem is less serious for us than it may turn out to be for the nations which have suffered the disarrangements and the losses of war longer than we. Our people, moreover, do not wait to be coached and led. They know their own business, are quick and resourceful at every readjustment, definite in purpose, and self-reliant in action. Any leading strings we might seek to put them in would speedily become hopelessly tangled because they would pay no attention to them and go their own way. All that we can do as their legislative and executive servants is to mediate the process of change here, there, and elsewhere as we may. I have heard much counsel as to the plans that should be formed and personally conducted to a happy consummation, but from no quarter have I seen any general scheme of "reconstruction" emerge which I thought it likely we could force our spirited business men and self-reliant laborers to accept with due pliancy and obedience.

Mr. President, there is no denying that for a short time the great liberal spirit of this country looked to Woodrow Wilson for its leadership; but there is also no denying the fact that for a long time this has not been the case, and that this statement alone, which reveals that the President does not understand conditions in this Republic, should be enough to turn the liberals of the country from him. I say this in no unkindness. We must have a solution for these problems which are real and pressing.

I recognize the fact, in extenuation of the statement quoted, that the President had been so preoccupied with a consideration of foreign questions that he had really not had the opportunity to sense and to appreciate the conditions which then existed in this country and which do now exist.

Mr. President, I desire to read portions of the amendments which I have proposed, with an explanation briefly of their meaning and of their purpose.

So far as the first amendment is concerned, it reads practically as the language of the bill down to the point where it says:

Provided, however, That the making of the census, registration, and schedule of inquiries relating to population shall be continuous, as hereinafter provided.

That is one of the chief points in my amendment or in my series of amendments. They provide for an enrollment or survey which shall be continuous and that, together with the fact that my amendments provide for a larger number of subjects for the schedule of inquiry, covers the substance of them. In a word, my amendments provide for a card catalogue, continuously revised, giving full information concerning the population of the United States.

Then in the second amendment, the amendment to section 2, there is a provision that so far as the census applies to the more fixed problems it shall be quinquennial instead of decennial. Referring to the continuous-enrollment feature, it says:

Provided, however, That the registration of the population and the schedule of inquiries relating thereto shall be commenced on or before the 1st day of July, 1919, and shall thereafter be continuous, and the results of the same shall be continually recorded and shall be from time to time compiled and analyzed, and useful statistics based thereupon published, as the public interest may require, but at intervals of not longer than five years: Provided, however, That information identifying any particular individual or firm shall not be published, but shall be held in confidence: Provided, however, That lists of all citizens over 21 years of age, arranged and divided into sections according to election precincts, districts, counties, congressional districts, and States, which lists shall contain information as to the race, sex, occupation, and residence of each such inhabitant over 21 years of age, shall be published on or before the 1st day of July in each year, such lists to be known as the "Official Federal registration lists," and to be printed for distribution in sections as described at such reasonable prices as may be determined upon by the Director of the Census.

Now, the object of the published list is that there should be, at the periods of election, official registration lists, containing addresses, in order that a candidate who desires to present to the voters of the country items of interest and of importance may have the addresses readily at hand. Of course, one of the objects of this publication is to also save the unnecessary expense of local registration for election purposes.

The next amendment to section 8 contains the schedule of inquiries which would be made, so far as the individuals are concerned.

SEC. 8. That the Fourteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to the education, health, insurance, agriculture, manufacture, forestry and forestry products, mines and quarries of the people of the United States and the colonies, and to the population of the United States and its colonies.

Into that schedule of inquiries the chief items introduced which are not in the bill are the items of education, health, and insurance, and, as will be seen later on, the employment or unemployment of the people of the United States. This does not, however, cover the whole subject, as will be seen by those who are sufficiently interested to follow the enumeration of the schedule.

The survey and schedules of inquiries and the records relating to population shall be so made—as to furnish continuing records of each inhabitant, which records shall be kept by complete card systems, in duplicate, one set of records to be filed in the census office of the local subdivision and one set to be filed in the office of the Bureau of Census in Washington when it shall be called for. Such continuous survey and records of the inhabitants of the United States shall be so made as to furnish an accurate schedule of vital, educational, and industrial statistics as a basis for the formulation of legislation to promote the general welfare, defense, and safety by improving the vital, educational, and industrial condition of the inhabitants, and such survey and records shall include specifically and in detail for each and every inhabitant the place and date of birth; acute and chronic contagious diseases; occupational diseases and accidents; school attendance and progress; business or vocational training; military training or service and wounds or disabilities contracted in service; high-school, college, or technical training; health and physical condition; the health and physical condition of all school children under 14 years of age, and of all males under 45 years of age, as ascertained by an annual medical examination; place, character, sanitation, and tenure of abode; relationship to head of the family; color; sex; age; conjugal condition; occupation; condition of employment or unemployment; registration in Federal employment agency; whether employer or employee; trade; business; public offices, honors or special achievements; payment of taxation or insurance premiums; whether qualified and habitually exercising suffrage rights in State and Federal elections; place of birth of parents, nationality, and mother tongue, and knowledge of English if born in a foreign country; nationality, mother tongue, and knowledge of English of parents of foreign birth, and number of years in the United States; literacy; and the date, place, and cause of death; and such schedules shall also include a survey of the almshouses, charitable agencies, and complete and partial pauperism in the United States.

Mr. President, with reference to this schedule of inquiry, I would say that it seems to be a rather voluminous schedule; but, as a matter of fact, practically all of these various inquiries are being made to-day. I wish that I might impress upon those who do me the honor to be interested in this subject that while this change in the method of taking the census seems to be a radical one and while it at first sight might seem to be a change which would involve a very great expense, this is not true, for, taking the country as a whole, without regard to the activities of the Federal and of the State governments—that is to say, taking the activities both of the Federal Government and of the State governments together—we find that this schedule is being investigated now, and that, also, in a practically continuous manner. For example, take the registration of births; we have a system of birth registrations. Take the registration of deaths; we are making that now.

I might say, briefly summing up the schedules which are now being followed, that the governments, taking the Federal and the local governments together, are now collecting these statistics in various ways, all of these ways, however, unsatisfactory and unscientific, one method conflicting with another and one agency with another. We are collecting, under our present schedules in operation, statistics with reference to births. When a child takes an infectious disease it is reported. When he enters school he is registered. Whenever he is promoted in school it is noted. When he graduates from the public-school system it is noted. When he takes tuberculosis or any other contagious or infectious disease as an adult it is noted. When he becomes 21 years of age he is registered. When he marries it is recorded. When he gets out of employment it is sometimes recorded. When an accident happens to him a record is often made of that. When an immigrant comes to the country a record is made of that fact. We are to-day practically making a continuous registration or enrollment of our people, but it is being done in such a way that statistics, as a result of the inquiries which are being made, are very largely without value, because they are unsystematically gathered and are so improperly classified and finally recorded that they are not available.

For example, take the question of the mortality statistics. They were first incorporated in the schedule of inquiries by the Federal Government under the Federal census in 1850. It was deemed most important for the accuracy of the census returns that we have a knowledge of the mortality statistics, but in the juggling about with the various census schedules mortality figures were finally dropped from the schedule of inquiries, and to-day while we have publications of the Government dealing with the question of mortality statistics, such as this great volume which I have in my hand, the statistics are very largely unreliable, because they are no longer collected by the Federal Government, but by various State agents and by certain medical societies. As a matter of fact, to-day the mortality registration area only covers about 41 per cent of the population of the United States, while so far as the birth statistics are concerned—and I am referring to these schedules to show how defective our census is and yet how we are attempting to gather these statistics—the registration areas from which reports of the births are required only include 32,000,000 white and 840,000 colored.

There may be reasons why we should know how many colored births there are in a year in the United States, but if there are such reasons we have no schedule of return upon that subject. I believe there are reasons, to which I shall refer later when I come to a discussion of the subject of public education.

Mr. President, I hesitate very much to trespass upon the time of the Senate in this manner, and I believe that most of the Senators here will acquit me of ever wishing to presume upon the patience of the Senate so far as the making of long addresses is concerned, but I must ask the indulgence of the Senate upon this occasion and upon the occasions of my future discussion of this matter, because the whole subject is to my mind so vital that I can not let it pass; I can not let it disappear from view in the vast multiplicity of legislation with which we have to deal here. I can not let it escape the minds of the Senators whose work is so arduous that it is really impossible for many of them to be continuously in this Chamber. I was, before my election to this body, one of the men who visited the Senate and who labored under the impression that because the Senate Chamber was not filled with Senators all the time the Senate of the United States was not performing fully its functions. I think there should be some sort of announcement clearly made to the people of the United States to the effect that the reason why Senators are not in this Chamber when they are not here is because they are so frequently pressed with public business that it is impossible for them to be in the Chamber.

In connection with the inaccuracy of statistics, we should consider the great subject of unemployment. Could there be a more important subject than unemployment, particularly during this reconstruction period? I think not. Unemployment is one of the great problems which governments must solve.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] interrupted me sometime ago and asked me what I considered to be the proper functions of government. I believe that students of government, from the wisdom which they have gained from a careful examination of governmental problems, must inevitably be led to the view that the problem of unemployment is a governmental problem which must be dealt with and solved. But how can we solve it unless we know what it is?

Mr. President, we knew in 1914 and 1915 that something was wrong in this country. We knew that there was unrest. We knew that there was such unrest that in some places the very foundations of the Republic seemed to be trembling. There were disturbances. There were thousands of hungry men walking the streets of our cities.

If you will pardon a personal reference, I will say to you now with all the earnestness I possess that, as a medical man who has taken particular interest in the subject of madness, the most terrible madman or the most dangerous animal that walks the earth is the hungry man.

Mr. President, in our discussion of problems of reconstruction, in our discussion as to how to restore peace in Europe, in our discussion as to how revolutions shall be quelled, and in our discussion as to how the spread of anarchy can be checked, let us not forget that there is no form of government in all the world that can hold hungry human beings in control.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is here. I do not believe that the Senator from Utah will disagree with me when I say that the question of employment or unemployment is a question which must be dealt with by the Government, certainly so far as the gathering of statistics is concerned, and by the Federal Government, because we already have what purports to be a Federal Employment Bureau. I do not care to criticize it at this time, nor its methods, but if it were in the hands of the most efficient scientific students and experts in the subject of unemployment in all the world it could not meet the situation, because we do not know how many men are employed, and we never have known in this country how many of our people were unemployed.

Speaking of the desirability of Government ownership, Mr. President, I would say that after the railroads have been in the hands of the Government for five years, if they are not more efficient than are the systems of public education, public health, and public employment in this country it will not take five hours only to go to New York, but it will require a Sabbath day's journey.

I was about to say that in 1914 and 1915 when we knew that something was wrong—and I desire to say I am not bringing this up in any partisan spirit—when we knew that there were a large number of unemployed, we were guessing whether there were 1,000,000, 2,000,000, or 5,000,000 men unemployed in the United States, and what did we have to do? It was imperative that the various employment bureaus should know how many men were unemployed in order to deal with the problem. What did we do? We had to go to one of the great industrial insurance companies of this country, that company being in closer touch with the hearts and the needs and the conditions of the people than their own Government, to find out how many men were unemployed, in order that the legislative bodies of this country might intelligently consider the great subject of unemployment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator, I ask if he will yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That was about the time that the administration created an employment bureau in every hamlet and village and city in the land and turned the post offices into employment bureaus; but that did not give work. Work is an economic proposition, and it is not too much to say that when the party is in power that protects the American market place from unfair and unnecessary incursions there is always employment for labor, and when the party is in power that wastes its substance in following the will-o'-the-wisp then they turn the post offices into employment agencies, and, of course, they keep more agents receiving applications than they have jobs to give out.

Mr. FRANCE. Well, I must say that I agree with the Senator from Michigan in the main. I think from what the Senator has gathered from my remarks he will realize that I am not one of those who believe that every citizen of the Republic should be nurtured all of his life on the Government pap. I believe as to the great Senator from Michigan, without reflecting upon his successor, that the Senator's going from this body will take from here a man who understands the fundamental economic problems of this country and the fundamental economic laws which, although we may call ourselves lawmakers, we have never yet learned how to supersede. The going of that Senator will be a loss to this body, for the very reason that he understands, for instance, that employment bureaus can not always give work. I am not prepared to discuss that subject just at this moment; but I want to say that the fact is that we must have the unemployment figures, if it be only to know what the situation is, if it be only to let the country know, in order that there may be a change from an unsound economic condition to a sound and stable one. I think the Senator will agree with me that it would be advisable at least to know the figures which record the unemployment at any particular time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Utah with pleasure

Mr. KING. I desire, in the time of the Senator, merely to say one word in reply to the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], whom the Senator from Maryland is now eulogizing, and in which eulogy I most heartily concur. However, in an humble and friendly spirit, I beg to state that the Senator from Michigan, like Ephraim, is still wedded to his idols, but he is so naive and delightful in his idolatry, in his refreshing devotion to protection, and high protection, that really his criticism of the Democratic principles and theories of economics falls upon my ears in so gentle and inoffensive a way as to soothe me into serenity. But really it is fair to say—and if the Senator from Michigan had occupied the floor a moment more he would have said—that you can not attribute the present economic and industrial condition of the United States to the tariff or to a lack of protection. The war has pushed aside the normal laws of trade and the law of supply and demand. The nations of the earth have been in a great war for four years, and we have been engaged in that war for 18 months or more. During this period the United States has been called upon to furnish billions of dollars' worth each year of our products for consumption in Europe. That has stimulated the market; it has drawn into manufacturing centers large numbers of the population of the United States. Wages have been increased. The abnormal situation by reason of the war has created an abnormal situation in our industrial and economic system. Four millions of men have been drawn from the channels of trade and commerce; that is to say, from the ordinary channels in which they were employed. More than 4,000,000 of men—a large number—have gone into industrial service. Four millions have been called into the military and naval service of the Government. It would be a physical impossibility to-day to take those men out of the military service and have them go back to their place in the industrial and social system of the country without more or less of disturbance. This transition unquestionably will result in more or less of paralysis in business.

We have a tariff now—a tariff in the shape of an embargo—so high that it has prevented exports, and in a large measure has prevented imports. You can not export and you can not import without securing a license, and the embargo is still in part in force. So the tariff question cuts no figure at all. Germany, a great competitor, and Great Britain, another great competitor, are unable now—Germany, at any rate, is—to compete with us or to ship anything into our markets. England furnishes us but little of her manufactured products. So the question of a tariff now cuts no figure in the present economic and industrial situation. If there is social unrest, if there is a falling of wages, and if there are men out of employment now, it seems to me that it is a rather strange mental concept to attribute that situation to the fact that we do not have a prohibitive tariff or a tariff so high that it might suit the views of the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

I think that the Labor Department has done a great deal of good in seeking to ascertain the needs of the people and trying to find where employment is required. The Labor Department heretofore—I mean since the war began—has not been so much concerned in furnishing places as it has been in getting men to fill places, because there were so many places in the industrial centers made necessary by the progress of the war that it was almost impossible to find men to fill those jobs. We did not have any tariff then, when there were two or three jobs for one man and when wages went from two, three, or four dollars a day to from ten to twenty dollars per day. So I think that if my friend intended to indulge in a fling at the Democratic economic and industrial views or policy he chose a very inopportune occasion for the purpose of indulging in his favorite pastime.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, of course I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Maryland——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I intend to interrupt the Senator from Maryland but for a moment.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has not closely followed the speech of the Senator from Maryland. The Senator from Maryland was dealing with the riots and the famine and the hunger and the distress antedating our entrance into the European war and antedating that war itself. He was talking about the situation in 1913 and 1914. It was to that situation that I addressed my remarks.

I am well aware that war conditions have surrounded this country with a protection greater than even I would be willing to extend, but that will go down in a night. When it has gone down the American business man wants to know what the policies of his Government will be. It is that uncertainty that we face to-day.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am intruding upon the Senator from Maryland, and I do not want to do that.

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Michigan means by his last statement and the preceding ones to indicate that whenever Republicans are in power there is no uncertainty and that business men are entirely satisfied, he ought to be entirely gratified now, for the Republicans won the last election. They will have the House and the Senate, and therefore the business men can be assured of the character of legislation which they desire.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Unfortunately, however, we have got to wait a couple of years for the Presidency, but so far as we have been able to go we have made very great progress. In fact, it is rather remarkable progress, and I am only too happy to be assured in this place formally by the distinguished Senator from Utah, for whom I have very high respect, and with whom I have served at both ends of this Capitol, that we are to have a Republican Senate after the 4th of March and a Republican House; but neither House nor Senate can make the laws alone. If on the 6th of November last a President in harmony with the new Congress had been chosen, the uncertainty would have disappeared; and I repeat that the periods alluded to by the Senator from Maryland where there were hunger and idleness and want were periods of Democratic ascendency, when we were laboring under their laws, and they brought ruin, as they have always brought ruin, and they lowered the credit of the Republic, and they discouraged initiative in business.

That is the plain, blunt truth about it, and I hope it does not offend my very sensitive, very able, and very patriotic friend from Utah to hear me say it.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, I was not attempting to pronounce any eulogy upon the work of the distinguished Senator from Michigan. If I had wished to do so, it would have taken me a much longer period than I feel I can avail myself of at this moment to express my very high regard for him as a legislator who understands and who regards in his work fundamental economic laws.

Mr. President, I do not desire at this time to enter into any discussion of the general question whether employment bureaus do or do not always meet a serious situation; but I shall before I finish my remarks upon this general subject discuss the present employment bureaus and whether they are meeting the situation, and I shall express some views, of course, as to how the amendments I propose, if enacted into law, would give us definite and accurate scientific data with reference to unemployment. I am merely saying at this time that we are informed by the wisdom, not only of theoretical students of government but by the wisdom of this very legislative body and of other legislative bodies throughout the country—referring, of course, to State legislative bodies—that it is very important for us as legislators to deal with unemployment, and hence to know how many unemployed men there are in the United States, particularly under such conditions as those which the Senator from Utah has described, I think, fairly and accurately—conditions which are entirely different from the conditions which prevailed in 1913 and 1914, which, in my judgment, were as serious as the conditions now, although due to wholly different causes, and I believe to the causes which have been referred to by the Senator from Michigan. However, the fact remains that we should know the number of unemployed at any given time, but that we have not at hand any adequate means by which we can ascertain the number of unemployed.

In 1913 and 1914 conditions were very serious in the city of New York. In order to ascertain how serious they were use was made of an agency called the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor. I am referring to a monograph on the subject of unemployment published by the American Labor Legislation Review. That association estimated on February 2, 1914, that on any given day during the winter of 1913–14 there were 325,000 unemployed men in New York. Quoting from this article, it says:

> But while relief agencies struggle with their problems of emergency relief, we do not forget that serious irregularity of employment is not temporary in America. It is continually one of our most wasteful industrial evils.
> The United States census for 1900 showed that 6,468,964 working people, or nearly 25 per cent of all engaged in gainful occupations, had been unemployed some time during the year.
> Of these, 3,177,753 lost from one to three months each, representing, on the basis of $10 a week, a loss in wages approximating $200,000,000; 2,554,925 lost from four to six months' work each, representing a wage loss of approximately $500,000,000; and 736,286 lost from 7 to 12 months' work each, representing a wage loss of approximately $300,000,000.
> Thus approximately $1,000,000,000 was lost in wages in the year.
> On this subject the census statistics are very unsatisfactory, but they are the figures gathered and published at great expense by the United States Government.

Mr. President, I could multiply quotations and pile up figures almost indefinitely which would prove to any man of open mind that the unemployment problem in this country is a most serious problem, but one the magnitude of which we do not know, because we have no agency by which the figures concerning unemployment are made available for the men who must legislate upon this great subject.

I care not now to discuss the character of the legislation necessary to correct an evil such as the unemployment evil; but surely when unemployment becomes widespread there is a cause, a removable cause, and there is a remedy necessary. At times it may be a high tariff and at other times there may be some other remedy which is needed; but when the situation exists it demands a remedy. The remedy, however, can not be applied until we know exactly the extent, the gravity, and the nature of the disease or difficulty which is to be met by the remedy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I have not had the pleasure of hearing all of the remarks of the Senator, but those that I have heard have been exceedingly interesting and instructive. As I understand, the Senator is not now addressing himself to the causes of social and industrial unrest and is not pointing out remedies therefor; but, as I gather from his remarks, he is seeking to amend the bill under discussion so that the Government can ascertain the number of persons at a given time, and at all times, for that matter, who are out of employment and the character of work they are most fitted to perform.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator from Utah is perfectly correct in his conclusion. My amendment, in a word, provides for a continuous survey of the population at all times, with a continual gathering of vital and social statistics, with card catalogue records, in order that there may be available the data concerning our population upon which we may base scientifically drawn legislation, data without which I believe precision of legislative action is absolutely impossible.

Mr. KING. I think we must all agree with the Senator. The Senator will remember that the science of statistics was developed by the French perhaps a century ago, and has been amplified materially since then; and there is much reason for the contention so earnestly made by publicists and learned legislators that there can be no comprehensive and scientific legislation without a knowledge of statistics, without full and complete data relating to the subject, including cognate matters. My present view is that it would be a proper thing for this Government to have a permanent bureau or department that would collect the statistics to which the Senator refers. With the changes which the future will produce in our industrial and economic conditions it will become more and more necessary that we shall have scientific data and full and complete statistics upon all questions affecting or relating to our social structure. The social organism will necessarily become more complex. It is the law of evolution. Progress exhibits itself in a change from the simple to the complex, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous. So while fundamental principles do not change, the variations in the social structure will call for a proper adaptation of the principles to the changed conditions.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I thought the Senator and myself would be found to be in agreement upon that general subject. I am very sorry that the Senator was necessarily out of the Chamber at the moment when I was also saying—and I wish I might impress this upon the mind of every Senator—that to-day we are collecting all of the statistics and we are making inquiries covering all these subjects, but we are doing it in an inefficient way, and the results are such that they are of practically no value. When I say that we are doing this work I refer to the agencies, Federal and State, without reference to the distribution of their activities; and that is the important thing to be remembered, that this does not provide for anything new. It provides for doing the old thing in a new way. I must admit that the cost to the Federal Government will be greater, but the local governments will be by so much relieved, and the aggregate cost of collecting all of these various statistics will be much less after we have substituted a uniformity throughout the process and after we have done away with the multiplicity of agencies which are now collecting these figures in such a way that they are of practically no social value.

I desire to read into the RECORD just at this time one more quotation from the American Labor Legislation Review unemployment survey of 1914 and 1915. In this connection I would call your attention to the fact that this survey was made after the census of 1910 by a private or a local agency, showing that the statistics which were collected under the census of 1910 were either wholly inadequate or they were so old as to be of no value; and I would say that the fathers, even going back to the early days of the Republic, discovered that the whole difficulty with the census was—and I will refer to that when I begin my discussion of the history of the census, which I will make as brief as consistent with clarity—that by the time its results were published the statistics were too old to be of any value; that is to say, so far as statistics of this character are concerned. They were of value so far as the primary object, the enumeration of the people, was concerned:

> In New York the mayor's committee on unemployment, using employers' pay rolls—

Another weak stick upon which we have had to lean—> calculated that in the whole city there were about 200,000 fewer persons employed in December, 1914, than in December, 1913. To many this figure seemed excessive, and the subsequent discussion led to a more systematic inquiry by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. Through its agents this company, in the latter part of January, canvassed its industrial policyholders in Greater New York, and, finding that 18 per cent of all wage earners in the families visited were out of work, figured that 18 per cent, or 442,000, of all New York's wage earners were unemployed.

Mr. President, I could go on, as I say, and multiply statements and pile up figures to show that we have no adequate method at present for the ascertainment of the number of unemployed. I could take up the same line of discussion with reference to many other subjects in these schedules. I might, for example, take up the subject of health, and we would find a similar condition. We are trying to solve these problems of health without knowing what they are. I hold in my hand a very interesting monograph, for example, upon the mortality from respiratory diseases in the dusty trades—quite an important subject—and if I desired at this time to go into it, I think I could prove to you without any question that we know practically nothing definite about the number of men employed in the dangerous and dusty trades. It is quite alarming to realize that there are something like 3,200,000 of them in the United States. Probably that is a fairly good guess. It was founded upon the figures given by one of the great insurance companies, and it is a very startling estimate. I think it is an approximate one, but I do not think the number has been underestimated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRANCE. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. I should like to say to the Senator that some of the matters to which he has just referred have received attention at the hands of some of the departments and bureaus. The Bureau of Mines, for instance, has given some attention to mining operations, and particularly to those mines in which dust is generated, and some of the States have compiled statistics relating to various occupations and occupational diseases and other matters embraced within the amendment offered by the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. I thank the Senator for calling the attention of the Senate to that fact, of which I am aware—a fact which further emphasizes the very contention which I am making, that these figures are being gathered to-day by a multiplicity of agencies, but these agencies are so scattered and their data after being collected are so unsystematically arranged that the results are not practically available.

Mr. President, I can scarcely hope to make a perfectly orderly and logical presentation of this subject, because it is really so vast that one becomes almost lost in it, and therefore I am not attempting to make any finished address upon this subject. I am simply, in a very informal way, trying to start a discussion upon this most important subject; and, in view of the informality of my remarks, I desire to recur for a moment to this subject of unemployment, as we have to deal with it, particularly in this reconstruction period. Referring to that subject, I desire to say this, and I shall refer to it again, as I have also referred to it before.

For the reconstruction period I think it would be fair to consider that there are two functions of government which must be as fully as possible exercised. One of those is protection by maintained order and the other is production. Referring to the interchange between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Michigan, I will say that our two political parties have always differed upon this subject as to the importance of national production so far as the national wealth is concerned. The Republican Party has always sought to encourage production. I feel that for the purposes of reconstruction we may consider the Government as a great business, so to speak, every adult citizen of which may be considered to be a worker capable of producing something to be added to the national wealth. The thing that has not been sufficiently recognized is that the disturbances which we see to-day all over the world, the revolutions which are occurring, have an explanation. There is a definite explanation for the fact that to-day in Europe and in Asia, taking certain territories together, there are more than 300,000,000 of people without responsible governments, speaking, of course, in a general way; more than 300,000,000 of people in a state of revolution.

Now, there is a reason, and, in a general way, I think we may say that this is the cause of the unrest and of the revolution. I have not changed my views on this subject. I said many months ago in this Chamber that I would not be surprised to see the war end in revolutions. It was only a question of time. You can not continue to draw indefinitely men and women from productive lines of activity and put them into destructive lines of work without ultimately having revolution, because the time is certain to come when an underproduction of the necessities and commodities of life will reach the point where men will no longer be satisfied, and then the wild, elemental passions which know no law break forth and men overthrow their government. So that, in a general way, the causes for the disturbance in Europe to-day are these: The underproduction of the various commodities and necessities of life, particularly food, and, of course, the faulty distribution of those articles which have been produced; but, in a general way, it is safe to say that the peoples of the world to-day are discontented and stirred with a profound unrest because there has been such an underproduction of the commodities and the necessities of life.

Mr. President, I wish I could make every man feel as I do about this, because if all felt as I do about it they would realize, as I do, the necessity for consummating a peace as soon as possible. I want to see a peace established which shall be as permanent as may be. I am in agreement with the ideals expressed by the President when he looks forward to the time when peace shall dwell in all parts of the earth and when men may devote themselves wholly to productive rather than at times giving themselves over to destructive activity.

If we look at the fundamental causes of unrest and revolution and agree that they are due to the underproduction of the commodities and necessities of life, it must appear that it is most urgent that the millions of men in the armies and not now productively employed be returned at once to productive lines of work in order that this great fundamental cause of world unrest, the underproduction of the necessities and commodities of life, may be promptly removed. That is what disturbs me with reference to the undue prolongation of the peace conference—this scarcity in the world of those commodities which must be had in an increased amount if men are to be kept orderly, and if they are to be kept satisfied with their governments.

I can not express to you how important I feel it is that these millions of men be sent home and helped as soon as possible, and without the loss of time to which the Senator from Utah has referred, into the various productive lines of work. There never was a time when every unit of man power was so needed for the production of useful commodities and necessities; and that is one reason why I am pleading for scientifically organized agencies which will pick up the man as soon as he returns home, and in some way assist him to find some productive line of work. The resolution which I introduced here yesterday, urging speed in the making of peace in order that production may be resumed as speedily as possible, expresses my views upon that general subject.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. KING. When the Senator attributes the social unrest now existing, and which has existed for some time, exclusively to the fact of underproduction, as he has denominated it, in foodstuffs and in the necessities of life, I think he states the question in rather an extreme way. There are individuals in this country belonging to the I. W. W. organization whose struggle is against production. They denounce the wage system and seek the destruction of all government and orderly processes that would make for production, peace, and prosperity. They are satisfied with no wage, no matter how high. If they demand and receive $10 to-day, they decree a strike to-morrow. If their further demands are granted, they strike again. If agreements are entered into between them and their employer, they regard them as of no binding force, and they keep on striking, hoping in time to destroy the entire wage system. Indeed, their purpose is to destroy the form of government under which we are living.

Those who belong to the I. W. W. organization would continue their destructive work no matter what wages were paid them or how abundant were the products of field and factory and farm or how great was the prosperity in the land. Indeed, the greater the prosperity the more vindictive would be their assaults upon the Government and the social and economic system.

The same is true of the followers of Lenine and Trotsky. It is a class war that they are waging. They want to destroy the bourgeoisie; they want to destroy everybody who does not belong to what they denominate the proletarian class. They will destroy by murder and by assassination and by starvation in order to consummate their devilish and hellish purposes. Already in Petrograd, and in the area of territory controlled by Lenine and Trotsky, they have announced the rule, and they are enforcing it with severity, that the soldiers shall get all the food they want. If there is any not required by the soldiers, who are hired mercenaries, employed to kill and destroy, then those supposed to be supporters of Bolshevism are cared for; but the middle class, the commercial class, the intellectual class, are being deliberately exterminated, either through starvation or by assassination. They are going to enforce class rule, even if in order to effectuate that they are compelled to destroy all other classes.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, so far as the I. W. W.'s in this country may be concerned, I feel that they are in a small minority, although I do feel that there has been much false economic doctrine taught, and I am sorry to say that some of it has been taught by certain of the labor-union leaders.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me for an interruption?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just heard the Senator say that much of the doctrine had been taught by labor-union leaders. I do not remember that any labor-union leader ever taught any bolshevism or ever taught any I. W. W. doctrine; and if the Senator remembers the name of any labor-union leader who ever did teach any of it, I should like to have him mention it.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator from Mississippi has misconstrued by remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because I remember distinctly that Mr. Gompers, and I remember that the balance of the people who are at the head of the labor unions in America, have taught the opposite doctrine, and have not joined in the anarchism and nihilism and the Bolshevism to which the Senator from Utah a moment ago referred.

Mr. FRANCE. I agree with the Senator on that. He misunderstood me. What I meant to say was this, and I think the Senator will admit that it is true: The labor-union leaders have taught the doctrine that high nominal wages are always desirable, and that high wages can be secured by a limitation of output, generally speaking; whereas the fact of the matter is that what ameliorates the condition of the laboring people is the production of a large amount of national wealth, and therefore a laboring man is often better off, more comfortable, more contented, more prosperous when he is getting $4 a day than when he is getting $10 a day, for it is not the nominal wage which must be considered; it is the real wage; for what will determine whether a man shall live in comfort or in discomfort is the purchasing power at the time of his dollar. One of the labor-union men recently said that the unions would not consent to any reduction of wages. I wish that such would realize that if we could properly organize the country for production and increase our production up to a certain point, labor's share in the production pile, as I call it, or in what is produced, would be larger, regardless of what the particular money wage is at that time.

The I. W. W. man of course is animated by several motives. Personally I am inclined to be charitable and believe that many of the I. W. W.'s are the unfortunate victims of a system which perhaps has not given them any full opportunity to prepare for the battle of life. Many of them have come from oppressed countries, such as Russia, where a man was practically a slave and where to him government for centuries has represented a cruel and relentless master. We must take all those things into consideration, even in passing judgment upon the I. W. W.'s. So far as the Bolsheviki of Russia are concerned, I think it is unfair to them for us to forget what government has meant to them in the past.

Thursday, January 16, 1919.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to continue the preliminary remarks which I was making upon yesterday, when the Senate took a recess, upon the amendments which I have offered to the census bill, which amendments I consider to be a part of what should be a national reconstruction program; and of course the national reconstruction program is a part of that great program of world reconstruction upon which we are about to enter, and upon which the sooner we do enter the better it will be not only for our own Nation, but for the world.

I said on yesterday, if I may be permitted to give a brief summary of my remarks, that in considering the reconstruction program it would be necessary for us at the outset to distinguish between those functions which should popularly be performed by Government and those functions the performance of which does not inhere at all in Government, many of which latter functions, Mr. President, I believe the Government has, through a mistaken policy, assumed during the present, now passing, emergency.

I called attention to the fact that I, personally, was not satisfied with conditions as they exist in the country to-day, but I attempted to give expression to my conviction that the unsatisfactory conditions which exist to-day in this country do not exist because of any defect in our governmental form. They do not exist because the Government has not assumed enough functions. It has, in my judgment, assumed too many. These evil conditions exist because the Government has not been properly performing those functions which do properly inhere in it.

I took the liberty, Mr. President, for purposes of my discussion, to refer to certain functions which I believe do inhere properly in government, functions which we have, by past legislation and by past national doctrine, incorporated into law and into practice, and called upon the Government to perform. I think there was very little dissension from my view on yesterday.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, as I know he is very anxious to conclude his remarks.

Mr. FRANCE. I am very glad to be interrupted by the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I would like to ask the Senator if he discussed on yesterday in connection with this reconstruction work any plan of legislation for labor during this reconstruction period?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes. I will say to the Senator that I referred to that subject. In fact, I will say that in a general way the whole object of my remarks and the purpose of the amendments which I have offered are directed to a serious economic situation which does now exist in this country, and which will exist in a more aggravated degree very shortly as a result of readjustment necessary in passing from war to peace conditions.

Mr. President, I took the position yesterday that the first step in reconstruction was to take the Government out of business and out of business deals and to strip it from the obligations of performing a mass of nongovernmental functions in order that it might be free to go powerfully, resistlessly, and efficiently ahead in the performance of those legitimate functions of government which it has not been efficiently performing and as a result of the failure to perform which intolerable conditions have grown up in this country, conditions which are not satisfactory to me nor to the masses of our people.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I suppose the Senator, in the comprehensive statement just made, is referring to the control by the Government of the railroads, telephones, telegraphs, and cables?

Mr. FRANCE. Particularly.

Mr. KING. And shipping interests?

Mr. FRANCE. Particularly.

Mr. KING. The control of which during the war the Senator, as I understand, would justify, but in peace times deems intolerable?

Mr. FRANCE. I must say that while the Senator has interpreted my remarks in the main correctly, I have not shared the opinion that it was necessary for the Government to assume those nongovernmental functions even during war. That, however, happens to be a very large question, as to the wisdom or the necessity of such an assumption during the war of those functions.

Mr. KING. But at any rate in peace the Senator plants himself upon the proposition that it is not a governmental function to take over railroads and to own and operate them, to take over telegraphs and telephones and cables and own and operate them; that governmental control and operation makes progressively for inefficiency, for extravagance, and for waste. Is that the position the Senator takes?

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator has stated my position very clearly and I appreciate his statement. That is my view. In fact, Mr. President, I even question the right of Government to assume to do the thinking for its people. That is one of the nongovernmental functions which this great Republic has attempted to assume in this great emergency. I would strip from this Republic those deterring and intolerable barnacles which we have allowed to accumulate upon her hull—such, for example, as the duplicity bureau, so-called the Publicity Bureau. The citizens of this Republic are not accustomed to a governess; they are not mental nurslings needing censored and predigested news. I said the other day in my discussion upon the espionage question that I could go out into the country—and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is looking at me very reproachfully because he realizes that when I say this I am borrowing a statement from him; I did not recall, however, until I saw that reproachful look upon his countenance, that I was doing it—that I could go out in the country, in Maryland, or in Virginia, and pick up in a short time dozens of men as competent to pass upon the Russian question as some of the men who are suppressing news which we should be receiving from Russia.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator from Missouri did not perhaps use these very words but this was his thought expressed in the remarks to which I refer. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Of course the Senator spoke in jest when he said I was looking at him reproachfully. The Senator might not know it, but I was looking at the Senator with approval because he was talking some good plain common sense that he did not get from me, but which he got from his own head. I agree with him fully.

Mr. FRANCE. I know the great Senator from Missouri, who differs with me in politics, is one of the men who has not lost faith in this Republic and in the patriotism and loyalty of our people under all circumstances.

Mr. REED. I go further than the Senator, perhaps being more specific. I do not think there is a newspaper reporter in Washington who would not have made a better censor than Mr. Creel. I will go further than that and say I do not think there is any man in the United States who is permitted to be at large who would not have made a better censor than Mr. Creel.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KING. I want to submit to him, and to the Senator from Missouri, if the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Missouri are not rather cruel to Mr. Creel. He has frequently been criticized in this Chamber, and there has not been a single Senator who has defended him; apparently all of the criticisms were approved by the Senate. It would seem to me that perhaps the time has come when we might lay a wreath upon the official (?) grave of Mr. Creel.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope the time has arrived, not because he is Mr. Creel. I know nothing about Mr. Creel or of his efficiency or inefficiency. But there is no such thing as a good censor, and there is no such thing as good censorship. I have always made it a practice to speak not against persons but against policies. Words fail me to describe my contempt for that policy of censorship which has been adopted during this emergency, my views upon that subject having been expressed in my remarks the other day upon the subject of the repeal of the espionage law.

Yes, I would cut away with an ax, as I said yesterday, all of these bureaus which have grown up here and which are impeding the proper progress by the Government in its legitimate work.

Mr. President, I took occasion yesterday to warn the liberal thinking men of this country to take notice of this intolerable situation which has grown up because of the assumption by the Government of many nongovernmental functions, by the doing of which the Central Government has also built up a tremendous machine which, should it ever fall into the hands of not only reactionaries but destructionists, could be used to prevent all progress in this Republic and place her back among those nations which have represented the most reactionary and despotic governments of the world. I wish that all of the liberals would stand warned by what has happened since the seizure by the Government illegally—and I have not forgotten the decision by a United States judge to the contrary, either—of the telegraphs, telephones, and cables.

I have respect for courts, but I want to say when courts can hold such an action as that legal and when they can hold that an espionage law such as was enacted is constitutional, that I part, in judgment, company with the courts.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator is administering an undeserved rebuke to the courts. I think that if anyone is to be criticized or anybody or functionaries are to be criticized it should be the Congress of the United States. The Congress of the United States enacted a law which under certain circumstances authorized the taking over of the telegraph, telephone, and cable lines. The court to which the Senator refers merely decided that it was a legislative question rather than a judicial question, that the court could not put itself into the position of the legislature and determine whether or not a question of policy was wise or unwise; that that was a function for the legislative branch of the Government. This position finds support in the political system which we inherited from England. The principle is as old as the English law. It is a part of the Anglo-Saxon institutions.

Now, the Senator may properly criticize the National Legislature for giving that power to the Executive; he may think—as many others do—that the policy was wrong; but he ought not to criticize the courts when they properly uphold the hands of the legislative branch of the Government. The Supreme Court has been criticized for some of its decisions, notably the one holding that the child-labor law was unconstitutional.

Critics have said that the Supreme Court of the United States ought to have taken the judgment of the legislative branch of the Government; that there are three coordinative branches of the Government; that the legislature determines the policy and the Supreme Court merely construes the law. I think the decision of the Supreme Court upon that question was right. I am inclined to think that the decision of Judge Hand upon the cable question was right. I am inclined to think the Senator's criticism, if it were leveled against Congress, would be entirely justified.

Mr. FRANCE. In reply to the Senator, I will say that I realize the force of his statement, and I know that he will be the first to acquit me of belonging to that class the members of which believe that the enactment of the legislation should always be the final act. I believe in reviews by the court. I have ever entertained the highest admiration for the decisions of the Supreme Court. I am not condemning the Federal judge who made that ruling, mistaken though I think he was. But I do want to say this: The Senator from Utah is a candid man, an honest man and a fearless man. He knows as well as I do that during the period of this war the legislative department of this Government abdicated in favor of the executive, and our orders were received from the executive department and obeyed.

If the Senator wants to question that I will refer him to what I referred to the other day, the vote taken by the Senate on an amendment to the espionage law. The amendment provided that even after the enactment of that law the people of the United States should have the right to speak "what is true, from good motives and for justifiable ends." The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], one of the ablest constitutional lawyers and one of the best legal minds in this body, rose and called my attention to the fact, of which I was well aware, that the language of that amendment was similar to that of the constitutions of many States, and he said that there was no possible objection to the amendment, and the amendment was adopted by the Senate. But what happened? The bill went to conference, and by order from the executive department the amendment was stricken out, and by an order of the executive department and a subordinate in that department the Senate of the United States also reversed itself and refused to keep in the law this clause assuring the American people the right to discuss not affairs belonging to Washington, not affairs belonging to the administration, but their own governmental affairs, denying them the very right to speak the truth from good motives and for justifiable ends.

I want to say that my feeling toward this decision of the court has arisen from a haunting fear which disturbs me, that as the legislative department of this Government has abdicated and subserviently followed the directions of the executive, so also might the court become subservient and—after thoughtlessly applauding and approving addresses delivered at the joint sessions of the Congress outlining great policies, the determination of the wisdom and the constitutionality of which might involve the most careful and prolonged consideration by the court—also yield its judgment. A haunting fear, I say, has come to me that perhaps, as the legislative body abdicated, so might the judicial. The able lawyer, the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], knows as well as I do that when the legislative body shall have abdicated and when the judicial body shall have abdicated the end has come, that the Republic has been utterly destroyed, and that, in place of a free Government here upon the Western Hemisphere a despotism has been built up as absolute as was that of Nicholas Romanoff, because the fathers all understood that the consolidation of these three powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, in any way in one would result in tyranny and despotism.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland has made a very impassioned defense of personal liberty and of the rights of the individual against the aggressions of the Government. In his eloquent statement respecting those questions I am in hearty accord with him. I believe that a bureaucracy may become as oppressive and tyrannous as an imperial form of government. There is no question but that there is a tendency in this Republic toward a bureaucracy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have got it here now.

Mr. KING. Indeed, I regret to say, it is encouraged by the people. The people of the States when they see an evil existing which is purely local and intrastate in character immediately rush to Washington and, upon bended knees and with uplifted hands, ask for Federal aid and for Federal interposition. I believe that there is a subsidence of that strong feeling on the part of the people which has developed and maintained local self-government, and which sought to preserve the rights and prerogatives of the States, the sovereignty of the States, and that we are yielding to the Federal Government powers which belong to the States.

The fault is largely with the people. There is not sufficient study of the science of government and of the struggles of peoples of the past to secure liberty. Our Constitution, to many, is as a sealed book, and appeals to its provisions for protection against an abuse of power and the assertion of policies destructive of a representative form of government too often fall upon deaf ears and provoke irritation upon the part of many of the people. There is an inclination to forget that there can be no true progress that is not founded upon the growth and development of the individual. Perhaps there are exceptions, and yet I make bold to assert that one of the infallible evidences of national decay among a people who have enjoyed liberty is the persistent and progressive disinclination to assert and maintain a vigorous individualism and a virile and vibrant local self-government and a willingness, indeed a purpose, to relinquish into the hands of bureaucrats, or a powerful centralized government, the control of all matters—individual, local, and domestic. Our Government is one of checks and balances. If these are disregarded, confusion is inevitable, and in the end a change in the form of government must result. The congestion of power in the hands of a few means that the people, who are the source of power, have voluntarily or involuntarily been deprived of the same. I am insisting upon the maintenance of our form of government, the preservation by the States of the powers reserved to them in the Constitution. I protest against this constant aggrandizement by the Federal Government. The States are becoming enervated, supine, and lifeless. Vigorous States, powerful and progressive local political units, produce good government and operate as powerful citadels against the assaults of power and the tides of absolutism that in all ages, among all peoples, surge against humanity's interests.

But, if the Senator from Maryland will excuse me for so stating, I am inclined to think he has been rather ungenerous toward Congress, toward the Senate, of which he is so distinguished and brilliant a Member, in his wholesale charges of a complete abdication by the Senate and by the House of Representatives of the functions which rest upon them.

Mr. FRANCE. If the Senator from Utah will permit me to interrupt him, I desire to ask does he recall that I used the word "complete"?

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator to say "complete abdication."

Mr. FRANCE. I said "abdication." "Abdication" may be either partial or complete. I do not recall that I used the word "complete."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am sorry the Senator from Maryland did not use it.

Mr. KING. Well, the Senator from Michigan supplements the statement of the distinguished Senator from Maryland, and the Senator from Michigan assumes the responsibility now of saying that there has been a complete abdication by the Senate of the legislative functions and powers which devolve upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is a large question, and I do not know that I would allow the Senator from Utah to state my judgment about it.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator from Michigan to use the word "complete" and to express regret that the Senator from Maryland did not use the word "complete."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is within the sound of my voice a Senator who for weeks, upon the other side of the Chamber, begged us to withhold these powers, and all around this Chamber he was criticized for doing so. We at least went a good way, I will say to the Senator from Utah, in abdicating the appropriate constitutional functions of Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. FRANCE. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. KING. Of course, I must yield whenever the Senator from Maryland desires me to do so, because I am trespassing upon his time.

Mr. FRANCE. I do not wish to interrupt the trend of thought of the Senator from Utah, but in that connection I think it is only fair for him to consider this proposition: That, after all, the essential question is not whether the abdication was complete, but whether there was any abdication, for abdications or assumptions of power are never complete at the beginning. The essential question is, Has there been any abdication?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We were told on the other side of the Chamber that the Constitution was for the time being nullified.

Mr. FRANCE. That doctrine was taught.

Mr. KENYON. And also on this side.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and also on this side.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator from Utah is making most interesting remarks, and I will say that I have no controversy with him; we may have a difference of opinion, but I know that his views and mine, in a large way, are quite similar upon this constitutional question, and I desire him to discuss the very question as to whether, after all, the completeness or incompleteness of abdication is the essential thing. Is not any abdication almost as bad as complete abdication—although I did not use the word "complete"?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, perhaps I put into the mouth of the distinguished Senator from Maryland a word which he did not use. I interpreted his remarks, however, as being a denunciation of the Senate because they had completely abdicated their function; but I understand him now not to make that contention.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope the Senator from Utah will not take such an unfair advantage of me as to say that I was denouncing the Senate. I was not doing anything of the kind.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. FRANCE. I was criticizing the Senate. I know that men with the very best motives, and men for whom I feel the deepest affection, said that in such an emergency it was better to have but one mind.

Mr. KING. I did not use the word "denunciation" in an offensive way at all.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope not.

Mr. KING. I intended it as the equivalent of the word "criticism." I think if the Senate has abdicated any of its powers it certainly should be subjected not only to criticism but to denunciation, because I agree with the distinguished Senator that if the tripartite division of powers which characterize this Republic shall be broken down and one coordinate branch of the Government encroaches upon the functions and powers of the other, serious consequences must inevitably result, and if the destructive course is persisted in, ultimately the Government would be changed in form or it would be overthrown.

Mr. FRANCE. Now, will the Senator from Utah yield for one definite question?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. FRANCE. I mean may I interrupt him, because I have the floor, as the Senator well understands.

Mr. KING. Certainly; and that was stated.

Mr. FRANCE. When the Senate, after several days of consideration—because when my so-called "speaking the truth" amendment was first rejected it was rejected without mature consideration, and when the Senate several days later, after what should have been a period of deliberation, although during all of the intervening time the subject was not under formal consideration—reached a mature conclusion, without a dissenting vote, that there should be, for the protection of the people of the United States, written into the espionage law a clause guaranteeing to the people the right to speak the truth from good motives and for justifiable ends—when the Senate reached the conclusion that this was a proper safeguarding of the people's rights, one guaranteed in the constitutions of a large number of the States, was it or was it not an abdication of its judgment and of its proper deliberative and legislative functions when a subordinate in the Department of Justice wrote a letter saying that this amendment would make prosecutions difficult, and when the Senate, upon hearing that letter, reversed itself in spite of the efforts which were made by the Republican Party—and I wish to tell the country and the liberals of the country that it was almost by a party vote—when the Senate reversed itself and followed the judgment of that subordinate of the Department of Justice, was or was not that an abdication of its deliberative and legislative functions and of its judgment in favor of the judgment of a member of one of the executive departments?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not think that the distinguished Senator has stated the situation in a fair and candid manner. The Senator seems to labor under the impression that to receive any suggestion from the executive branch of the Government is an encroachment upon the rights of the legislative branch. That obviously is incorrect, because often we seek the opinion of the executive branches of the Government with respect to matters coming properly under their cognizance; indeed, very much of the legislation which is enacted here is initiated—if I may be permitted the expression—by the executive branch of the Government. In the administration of the law officials and departments find imperfections, loopholes, weaknesses, and it is their duty obviously to challenge the attention of the legislative branch of the Government to those imperfections with a view to having them corrected. Accordingly, we are constantly asking the departments for suggestions, for advice, for their views respecting contemplated legislation. The legal department of the Government frequently prepares bills which Congress desires and some of which the executive department in the proper administration of its duties find are necessary in order to meet the exigencies of the hour.

Mr. FRANCE. May I interrupt the Senator at that point?

Mr. KING. Of course I must yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I wish to ask the Senator if he wishes to be put in the position of making no distinction between our asking advice before our action and our reversal of an action reached unanimously after orders have been issued or advice given?

Mr KING. Of course there is a distinction; but I am somewhat familiar with the incident to which the Senator refers and I do not think, as I said a moment ago, that the Senator fully portrays the facts in the case. The facts in brief are these, if the Senator will pardon me—and I say again I am trespassing upon his time——

Mr. FRANCE. I have recited the facts. I am not responsible for the Senator's conclusions, but I substantially recited the facts.

Mr. KING. There is some little inexactitude in the recitation which has just been given by the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. Well, the Senator will certainly acquit me of any deliberate intention to misstate the facts. It is difficult to remember all the details.

Mr. KING. Absolutely, because I know the Senator is incapable of making a willful misstatement of facts, or of conclusions, for that matter; but the facts in brief are these: We found when we were plunged into war that laws were necessary to deal with a number of important questions. It became necessary to place embargoes upon certain products, to provide punishment for spies and those engaging in treasonable undertakings and in transmitting information to the enemy. Another important question which needed attention was the question of publishing in this country matter that was prejudicial to the progress of the war, the publishing of seditious and revolutionary matter that would have prevented the execution of the draft law and the proper administration of laws enacted to prepare this country for the great struggle upon which it was entering. As a result of that situation the Department of Justice, at the request of Senators and Representatives, and doubtless at the request of the President of the United States as commander in chief of the Army, who was familiar with the situation and knew what the exigencies of the hour required, prepared a bill covering these subjects. It came in here as a criminal code dealing with most important questions. The bill passed and became a law. Later it was found necessary to amend certain provisions of the statute. In considering the measure to amend the original espionage act the Senator from Maryland offered the amendment to which he has referred. It was agreed to. Later the conference committee struck out the amendment and the Senate accepted their report.

While the bill was in conference the Attorney General, through his assistant, transmitted a letter to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who had charge of the bill upon the floor, in which he indicated that if that amendment were to prevail in his opinion it would nullify important provisions of the law. The Senator from Maryland states that because of that letter, which was read and influenced Senators, they changed their opinions with respect to the amendment, and that that constituted an abdication upon the part of the Senate of its functions, resulting from the demands of the executive department. I deny that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, let me give the Senator a concrete case.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Michigan will pardon me, let me complete what I was about to say, and then, if the Senator from Maryland will permit, I shall be very glad to have the Senator from Michigan interrupt me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to give a concrete case showing where we were led off.

Mr. KING. In this particular case many Senators, lawyers among them, took the same view as the Assistant Attorney General; others took the view—and I was among that number—that the amendment as offered by the Senator from Maryland did not affect at all the interpretation which the courts would place upon the bill, and that his amendment was therefore unimportant. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who voted for the amendment, submitted an argument showing that the amendment added nothing to the proposed law. Other Senators did believe that the amendment would embarrass the Government in prosecutions under the law and permit guilty persons, persons whose motives were sinister and criminal, to escape punishment. In voting for the conference report I deny that Senators abdicated their judgment. Some of them, upon giving the matter further consideration, reached the conclusion that the amendment of the Senator would perhaps nullify the bill.

But coming now, specifically, to the charge of the Senator that there has been an abdication, in part at least, upon the part of the legislative branch of the Government in favor of the executive during the progress of the war, I want to invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that substantially all of the legislation relating to the war has been enacted by the unanimous vote of the Senate. There has been no controversy. Republican Senators and Democratic Senators believed that most of these great war measures—the draft law, the great measures that made for the building up of a fighting machine, the caring for our soldiers, and so on—were proper, whether they originated in the departments or whether they first found expression in the committees of either branch of Congress. I do not think it quite fair or just to say that Congress has abdicated its functions. I acquit Republican Senators who voted for these great war measures of an abdication of their legislative functions because they supported them. I think that the Senate and the House in this war, as the Senate and the House in other wars, have felt that we were compelled in time of war to enact legislation which we would not enact in time of peace; and we have relied more upon the suggestions of the Executive than in time of peace, because the Executive knew better than we, in many respects, the questions that needed legislative attention.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has, of course, made a rather glowing defense of the rectitude of Congress; but much of the complimentary reference to this side of the Chamber is lost when I know that our supine acquiescence was not always the result of our judgment, and I think Senators on this side have held their noses when they voted for about nine-tenths of the legislation that the Executive has forced upon us.

Mr. KING. I think, if the Senator will pardon me, that I will defend the Republicans against his indictment of his own party. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think I would be a little suspicious if the Senator from Utah defended this side of the Chamber.

Mr. KING. I think I could do it, perhaps, with better grace now than the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. With better grace, but not more fact or knowledge. The Senator's grace I admit, and his ability to do it interestingly, of course, would be acknowledged; but I will take my part of the responsibility for having voted against my judgment scores of times, and I know that I do not stand alone in that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But when the Senator from Utah takes up a concrete case, I have one in my mind. The Constitution vests in Congress alone the right to declare war; and yet our entire fleet and our Army were headed for a neighboring state in this hemisphere absolutely upon the ipse dixit of the President of the United States, and we came along supinely, and perhaps patriotically, and ratified what he did. It only shows the growing tendency of the executive department to thrive upon what it feeds on; and, while I do not want to enter into any controversy about it now, I have a record that I am proud of in connection with the war. I am perhaps as radical a partisan as there is in this Chamber, and I have no apologies to make for it. I believe that about everything the Democratic Party has tried to do was wrong and that the country has paid the penalty for it, and that sooner or later the common sense of the American people will return to power the party that has made progress, given encouragement to our countrymen, protected our market places, and so forth.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has not forgotten that this party has been voted into power, so far as the legislative branch is concerned?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. But the dulcet tones that came from the lips of my friend from Utah yesterday were the only real encouragement that I have had recently that the Senate would be Republican after March 4. The Senator admitted yesterday that it would be, and I was glad, because I respect his judgment, and I think it is quite vital; but we are far from being in power. We can not make a law until we have some one at the other end of the Avenue in sympathy with the congressional viewpoint, and for that we will have to wait two years—no longer, I hope.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield for a moment, although——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Wait just a moment. I thought the Senator yielded to me.

Mr. FRANCE. Yes; I have yielded to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I thought the Senator interrupted me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Perhaps I did; and I want to be very courteous to my friend. I have served with him in both Houses of Congress, and there is no one for whom I have higher respect. I sympathize somewhat with his contention that we have maintained a fair degree of legislative independence; but if he is satisfied that we have lived up to the time-honored and historic principles of our predecessors, he is a long way from a sound base.

Now I yield to the Senator from Utah if I have anything to yield. I am afraid I have not.

Mr. KING. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Maryland for a moment.

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Of course, it is impossible, Mr. President, when I am interrupting the Senator from Maryland, to adequately reply to the Senator from Michigan, who has now drawn an indictment against the Democratic Party, not only during this Congress but in the past. I have not time to review the Mexican situation, which the Senator has dragged into the discussion. Regardless of what some may think upon that question, it is sufficient to say that the American people approved of the policy of Mr. Wilson in dealing with the Mexican question, and two years ago he and the Democratic Party were continued in power.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He did not accomplish anything down there. He spent $200,000,000 in chasing a bandit, and the bandit is still doing business.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there are many angles to that, and it would take a longer time than I have at my disposal now to reply to what the Senator has said; but I do concur in part with the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Maryland. There has been a great tendency upon the part of the executive departments of the Government to override the legislative branch of the Government. A great President, a man whose untimely death we all deplore, and for whose memory we feel a profound respect, did not hesitate to use "the big stick" over Republican Senators and Congressmen, and to drive through, over the protests of Republican Senators and Republican Congressmen, measures which he conceived to be for the public good. No Executive has exercised greater power over the legislative branch of the Government than the great President to whom I have just alluded. I am not here now to make any criticism of his conduct in that respect, but I do concur in the view of the distinguished Senator that there is a disposition growing in the country to subordinate Congress to the executive departments of the Government; to the bureaus and clerks and satellites in departments, who too often attempt to foist upon Congress their visionary and selfish policies and to compel the enactment of legislation which more strongly entrenches bureaucracy in the Government. Speaking for myself, I feel that the Congress has not always asserted its powers and its functions and prerogatives, and has been oftentimes too subservient to the executive arm of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. But let me say, in conclusion, that with respect to war legislation I believe that both of the distinguished Senators who speak so ably for the Republican Party, when they take up one by one these bills that have been enacted during the progress of the war, will say that they constitute a monument of fine and splendid legislation, a tribute to the patriotism of Congress and the American people; legislation which conduced to the winning of the war and brought it to a termination much sooner than if partisan controversies and obstructive tactics had characterized the workings of Congress.

In the days of Mr. Lincoln much of the great war legislation was originated by him and by his Cabinet; and the Republicans, then in control of the House and the Senate, registered, often without any protest, the wishes—the edicts, if I may be permitted the expression—of the executive branch of the Government. They felt, as Congress has felt now, that in periods of war the Executive power is stronger, and the legislative branch of the Government is called upon to make some sacrifices and some concessions in order to carry out the stupendous tasks which the war devolves upon the country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Maryland, but——

Mr. FRANCE. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has just said that the late President Roosevelt used the "big stick," which recalls to my mind the fact that while this body passed a resolution asking that the late Col. Roosevelt might go to France to take part in the war the President of the United States paid no attention at all to that recommendation. Frenchmen wanted him to come. The great Clemenceau wrote a letter to the President asking that Roosevelt might be sent over to inspire his countrymen. No attention was paid to it at all. The executive department has been the controlling department of this Government ever since the war broke out. You can not compare it with Lincoln's situation. Lincoln had a committee of Congress always at his elbow with whom he consulted about every question of policy.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, a committee which some persons afterwards denominated "a smelling committee", which was offensive to President Lincoln and to some of the leaders of his party.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was not offensive to President Lincoln. I know personally one of the men on that committee who enjoyed the confidence of Mr. Lincoln. I know another who lived in honor all his life and closed his days amid the lamentations of his fellow citizens and neighbors. Oh, no; no committee that Mr. Lincoln would call about him would smell bad, even to a Democrat, and I deny that that committee smelt bad, although I do not know anything about it; I was too young to know anything about it, but there are men within the sound of my voice who know something about it personally.

I noticed that my friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] entered the Chamber a moment ago, and it reminded me of the fact that he was one of the men who said that the Constitution went up the chimney when war was declared.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not argue the question with him.

Mr. LEWIS. I must say I am not aware of that observation by me, but I did say, and do repeat, that certain policies are applicable to a time of peace that are suspended as to similar operations in time of war. That I repeat.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not mention the Senator from Illinois to engage in any controversy with him. He and I came into Congress together and we are going out together, and I am glad of it, because there will be less smoke after we are gone. [Laughter.]

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. FRANCE. I would appreciate it very much if the Senator would allow me just for a moment to conclude what I was saying, and to merely add one thing in reply to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I am sure he will acquit me of being one of those who utilize this platform to speak for the Republican Party. I hope that in what I say here I shall be speaking for the Republic and not for the Republican Party, and I know the Senator in all that he says is trying to speak for the Republic and not for the Democratic Party. I feel that should be made clear.

I was diverted in what I was saying by this colloquy which introduced the subject of free speech. In connection with the subject of free speech I have been asked a number of times by men, thoughtful men, as to whether I believed, in an emergency such as we have passed through, men of the socialistic party and of the pacifist party should be permitted to abuse the right of freedom of speech. In reply to that I have given this answer, and I always try to speak the words of a great man in answer to a difficult question which I do not feel competent to answer fully myself. I have answered this question in the language of Benjamin Franklin. I ask leave to introduce it into the RECORD. I have quoted it before. I want to refer just to the last part of it, which I give in answer to the question as to whether the abuses of free speech should be suppressed:

> Those abuses of the freedom of speech are the excesses of liberty. They ought to be repressed; but to whom dare we commit the care of doing it? An evil magistrate intrusted with power to punish for words would be armed with a weapon the most destructive and terrible. Under pretense of pruning off the exuberant branches he would be apt to destroy the tree.

That is my answer. The fathers who founded this Republic knew something. I ask permission to insert the whole of this in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? There being none, it will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> Freedom of speech is a principal pillar of a free government; when this support is taken away the constitution of a free society is dissolved and tyranny is erected on its ruins. Republics and limited monarchies derive their strength and vigor from a popular examination into the action of the magistrates; this privilege in all ages has been and always will be abused. The best of men could not escape the censure and envy of the times they lived in. Yet this evil is not so great as it might appear at first sight. A magistrate who sincerely aims at the good of society will always have the inclinations of a great majority on his side, and an impartial posterity will not fail to render him justice. Those abuses of the freedom of speech are the excesses of liberty. They ought to be repressed; but to whom dare we commit the care of doing it? An evil magistrate, intrusted with power to punish for words, would be armed with a weapon the most destructive and terrible. Under pretense of pruning off the exuberant branches he would be apt to destroy the tree. (Franklin: Works, by Sparks, Vol. II, p. 285.)

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland now yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. FRANCE. If the Senator will allow me just a moment, I will say that I was discussing the assumption by the Government, making, of course, for inefficiency, of powers which do not properly inhere in government. In order that my position may be made perfectly clear to everyone, I wish to say that there is no power legitimately inhering in this Republic to build up a great bureau of Democratic spies to protect an autocratic administration again criticism, a system of espionage by which man spies upon man and neighbor upon neighbor, and under which men have been thrown into prison because of opinions and words; not for acts, but for opinions and for words. I can not be brought to believe that there is that power vested in the Republic, or that the fathers ever intended that that power should be conferred by the Constitution of the United States.

I was saying, for the purposes of my discussion, that there were legitimate functions of government—the census or survey, public education, the preservation of the public health, the creation of employment agencies. I was saying that the remedy for many of the evils from which we suffer would be the making of those legitimate functions complete, so far as their performance is concerned, by making the performance of them efficient and universal. That is the subject the discussion of which I desire to continue to-day, and perhaps for some days and weeks to come, because it is a large subject, and I am one of those who believe that the reconstruction program and policies and solutions will not "emerge," but that they must be constructed out of the brain and sweat of men who are willing to devote themselves to a solution of these problems and who are also willing to see things as they are and not as they would have them be.

Mr. President, continuing the preliminary remarks which I began yesterday afternoon on the subject of certain amendments which I have offered to the census bill and which are now pending, I desire very briefly to outline the purpose and the nature of the amendments.

As I intimated yesterday, these amendments not only very radically change the method of the census but they go to the very heart of the theory of the census, and I believe to the very heart of the great problem of national reconstruction.

Before proceeding with the discussion as to the general nature of the amendments I will say that so far as the schedules of inquiry are concerned they are not materially modified, although I have added to the schedules of inquiry two very important items, the item of education and educational agencies and the item of public health and public health agencies, and a third somewhat minor subject for inquiry, the subject of insurance and insurance agencies. So much for the present upon the question as to the schedules of inquiry for which my amendments provide.

There is one other important change to which I will call attention at this point, and that is a change in the census period so far as the inquiries are concerned into educational agencies, insurance agencies, agriculture, manufactures, forestry and forest products, mines and quarries, the interval at which a survey is to be made of those particular subjects of inquiry being 5 instead of 10 years. That is not a radical departure from the committee bill, as the committee bill already provides for an examination every five years, so far as certain of these items are concerned.

But, Mr. President, the essential and vital change which will be effected by the adoption of these amendments is this: The schedule of inquiries concerning population would be made not every 10 years but continually, and continually recorded by a card catalogue system. These amendments provide for a continuous survey of the population of the United States and of all those great vital and social questions which concern the population. Under my amendment there would be such a continuous gathering of social, industrial, and vital statistics as would give us the data scientifically gathered, systematically classified, and accurately recorded by a card index system, upon which we might base legislative action, and having which before us we could legislate with intelligence and precision.

I shall attempt to show that it is of supreme importance that the census methods should be so changed that the census would give us this continuous enrollment and survey of our population in order that we might have before us the vital, industrial, and social statistics which are absolutely necessary if we are to act intelligently as a legislative body.

My amendment provides for such a continuous enrollment, and therefore it would seem to be a very radical change in the method of taking the census, a change which would perhaps involve in the aggregate a very great expense to the Government; but, as I showed yesterday, I think quite clearly, although I discussed the subject only briefly, we are not doing anything essentially new when we inaugurate such a system of continuous survey and enrollment. We are simply doing an old thing a new way, for I indicated on yesterday that we are at present, through the various agencies, Federal and State, collecting such vital statistics. I endeavored, however, to make it clear that these statistics were being collected by such a multiplicity of agents and in such an unsystematic manner that they give us no clear comprehension as to the condition of the country at any particular time so far as the population might be concerned and the health and the education and the condition of employment of the population.

Under this new plan the country would be divided, as under the plan provided for in the bill, into various census divisions, subdivisions, and also into precincts. The census divisions, of course, would correspond so far as possible—and this is also the provision in the committee bill—to the congressional districts. Under my plan the census subdivisions would correspond to the political subdivisions of the various States, such as counties and legislative districts, and each of those subdivisions, such as counties and legislative districts, would then be subdivided into census precincts, each one of which would correspond so far as possible to the election precincts of that particular political unit.

My plan calls for a card catalogue, continually revised and kept up to date, of all the inhabitants of the United States. It also calls for a permanent census office in each census subdivision, which office shall be maintained at all times, and which office will ultimately be located in a Federal building in that particular census subdivision, in which Federal building, after additional legislation which I have in contemplation is enacted, there would also be accommodated the local branch of the Federal Employment Bureau, of the Federal Health Bureau, and also the offices of the local agricultural agency, such as the United States Government now maintains in cooperation with the States in almost every county of the Union, with certain important exceptions which I do not care to discuss now.

It becomes obvious that what I am seeking to do is to substitute a uniform Federal agency or system for the collection of these statistics in the place of a multiplicity of agencies which are now collecting them in a most inefficient manner.

The births, for example, which are now recorded by the county and other authorities would, of course, under this system be recorded in the local subdivision of the Federal Census Bureau. To put the subject somewhat more concretely before you, and to make it clear as to how this system would operate, as clear as I may in a reasonable length of time, I will say that in a general way the plan calls for the enrollment of the name of a child, as soon as it may be born, upon the record books of the Republic as a citizen of the Nation, on the theory that every child born becomes at once both an asset and a liability to the Republic, an asset inasmuch as he will grow up to become a part of the great Government of the Republic, and a liability because with his birth upon the soil of this Republic the Nation becomes obligated to him in certain ways. It becomes obligated in some way, either directly under the Federal system or indirectly under a State system—and that question I do not care to discuss at this time—for the preservation of his life, first; and, while I am not going into any discussion at the moment of the constitutional question as to how far the State and as to how far the Federal Government should deal with the individual so far as these particular cares and responsibilities are concerned, I want to say that one of the objects of the Federal Government as enunciated by the fathers was the preservation of life. You say that, of course, meant the preservation of the life of the citizen against an attack by a foreign or by a domestic enemy. Well, that is true; probably the fathers were thinking of that; but the language of the Constitution is very clear that one of the objects of the founding of the Republic was to guarantee the opportunity for life. When a child is born into this Republic, this Republic, either directly or through some of its agencies, becomes responsible for the preservation of the life of that child, not only against visible enemies but against the far more dangerous, insidious, invisible enemies which exist in multitudinous form. I am referring, of course, to bacterial and infectious diseases.

Of course, I know that there are many constitutional lawyers who hold, and upon good authority—because I think in a large way the fathers so held—that the subject of public health was one which should be left to State agencies; but while in theory that may possibly be true, yet, as a matter of fact, the theory is scarcely applicable to modern conditions, and we have persistently repudiated that theory in the actual practice of the Government.

With the growth of our knowledge of communicable disease and the causes of communicable disease—which, of course, are biological entities, the germs being living organisms—we found, as we became acquainted with these germs, that while many of them had undoubtedly taken courses in constitutional law, while many of them had attended college, university, and law school, and had sat within the persons of distinguished legislators, in the dignified legislative bodies of the land, yet unfortunately they had not accumulated any knowledge of constitutional law and had not learned the fine distinctions between State and national sovereignty. It seems impossible to convince these germs, in spite of this remarkable training which many of them have received, that they can not be permitted to travel along the arteries of interstate commerce.

Mr. President, we have practically admitted in our accumulated body of legislation that, so far as the public health is concerned, it has become a national problem, and that it must be dealt with by one agency, that agency operating universally and precisely over all the territory of the Republic. I shall go into that matter somewhat more fully later on.

I need not recall to you the many ways in which we have recognized that the subject of communicable disease must be dealt with nationally. I need not point out to you the accumulating evidence of the growing conviction that the great disease of tuberculosis, which annually kills more people than have ever been killed by any war, except possibly this one, can not be stamped out by State agencies. The bacillus of tuberculosis is interstate in its pernicious action, and it can not be caught and prohibited from doing its virulent work by any divided sovereignty. I think there is also a growing conviction that however commendable—and no man would go further in commending them than I—may be the efforts of private agencies to stamp out this disease, it can not be stamped out by such agencies or by the selling of Red Cross stamps. Tuberculosis is as preventable as any disease can be. The Department of Agriculture, operating all over the country, is eradicating it from the herds of the country; and as that department is operating widely over the country to stamp it out so far as the bovine animals are concerned, so we also have the authority to constitute Federal agencies to act regardless of State lines to prevent it so far as human beings are concerned—a much more important matter.

But I have been diverted somewhat. I say that we must act upon the theory that every child born becomes an asset and a liability to this Republic, and that we must first protect his life not only against enemies, foreign and domestic, but against the invisible enemies which, however domesticated, still remain alien and destructive. When the child takes a communicable disease now it is reported to some agency—to a county agency, to a State agency, to a private agency, or somewhere else—and that report is soon lost or forgotten.

When the child goes to school his name is recorded on the public rolls of the school. When he is promoted it is recorded; his course of study is recorded; his graduation from the school is recorded; his reaching of age is recorded; his becoming a voter, of course, is recorded. When he is married it is recorded; when he has an industrial accident or disease it is recorded somewhere, generally either for the purposes of local State compensation acts or for some other purpose.

The Federal agencies are collecting statistics all the time so far as industrial diseases and accidents are concerned. In other words, we have going on now a continuous survey or enrollment, which is being carried on, however, by such a multiplicity of agencies that the results are not standardized and the data are not practically available.

Under this plan, when a child is born a card will be made out showing the names of his parents. Of course, if his parents had already been recorded, as they would be under this plan, we should have upon the cards, with the names of his parents, their records, showing the heredity of the child—a most important item. There are those, for example, who are interested in certain of the industrial diseases who are pleading for their elimination, because they not only destroy the life of the individual himself but because they weaken the children who are born of those who have contracted such industrial diseases. This birth-record card would show the child's heredity. It would be, of course, sent to the subdivision office in the county in which he was born. Then, of course, when the child took a communicable disease, a card would be dropped in the post office by the physician, without stamp, saying, "John Doe, number so-and-so, scarlet fever." This fact would be recorded at once on the appropriate card in the subdivision office. When the child entered the school, that would be recorded; his progress in school would be reported by the educational agency having charge of his education and recorded; so that on his card, under this system, there would be a continuous record of his progress. At any particular time by telegraph we could find out exactly how many boys and girls were in the high schools or how many were in the primary schools, and we would know almost instantly where our educational system was inadequate and where it was breaking down.

Of course, this opens up a very large question. I am not planning to discuss the psychological aspects of this question of continuous enrollment and record. A great stimulus would finally result to the ambitions and the energies of the people if each one realized that what he achieved for the Republic was to be recorded on the card of the Republic as a permanent testimonial as to the share taken by him for the welfare of the Government. The soldier, fighting the battles of the Republic, would know that when he came home, if he had received a cross of honor, that would be noted upon his card, and so on. I could illustrate it, of course, in many ways, and many things will suggest themselves to Senators.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRANCE. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator for a question, but I should like first briefly to outline somewhat further my plan, and then I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall wait until the Senator has concluded upon that point.

Mr. FRANCE. Then, I desire to make clear the practical operation of this plan, particularly so far as employment and unemployment are concerned.

I attempted to show yesterday that the chief problem of reconstruction was production. Reconstruction means production. There has been for a long time an underproduction in the world of the commodities and necessities of life. Men are hungry; men are unshod; men all over the world are lacking in those things which are necessary for a comfortable human existence. There is a shortage of food; there is a shortage of shoes; there is a shortage of clothing. Men are miserable in many parts of the world because their fundamental human needs are unsatisfied, and men are in revolution also for that very reason, for, after all, while you may discuss the political causes of revolution as much as you please, generally the causes go deeper than mere political questions. I am not meaning to say that if the French peasants had not been hungry and deprived of the materials necessary for a comfortable human existence in time there would not have been a French Revolution; but, as a matter of fact, the French Revolution did not begin until human misery had reached a certain point.

For years the worst government in all the world oppressed and degraded the Russian people; for years effort after effort was made to overthrow that despicable government—the most despicable, we should remember, which has ever been known in the history of the world—for years efforts were made to overcome it, and yet by one device or another the Russian people were called in this war to the colors and went and fought for their country obediently. They were not altogether satisfied with their government; but they were reasonably well fed and well clothed, and no man can read the history of the Russian revolution and not realize that what finally precipitated it were hunger and want. Owing to a colossal war effort, made in an unorganized and unsystematic way, there had grown up, because of the underproduction and the faulty distribution of food and also the underproduction and faulty distribution of other commodities, a condition in Russia which was intolerable. People were starving upon the streets of the cities. I shall not take the time of the Senate to review the conditions; but the Russian revolution was really a revolution which was precipitated by the lack of satisfaction of the fundamental human needs of the people.

You can not hope for the reestablishment of national stability—and upon the establishment of national stability depends, of course, the reestablishment of international order—you can not hope for the establishment of national stability throughout the world until you have produced enough to satisfy those elemental human needs which must be satisfied before you can put the people into such a state of body and mind that they will be willing to listen to the voice of reason.

There were those filled with hatred who said that no exportation of food to some foreign enemy countries should be permitted; but Mr. President, such a policy as that could not be for long. It soon began to be realized that, unless revolution was to spread over the world, we had to supply the fundamental, elemental human needs of the peoples in Europe.

Mr. President, I think that while we have been discussing this war for a long time, many of us have failed to realize the fact that it is a widespread disturbance of the world. I referred to the fact on yesterday that there were at least three hundred and ten or three hundred and fifteen million people who were without responsible government and in a state of absolute revolution. I thought I had here the figures which I have compiled to show the number of people not only in the countries now in an actual state of revolution but the numbers of the inhabitants in all of those countries in which there is a profound unrest. Taking them all together, not counting the allies and the United States, more than 800,000,000 people, chiefly, I believe, because of the failure to satisfy the elemental human needs, are in countries in which there is at least a profound unrest if not actual revolution. I have taken the trouble to compile a statement showing the widespread nature of this disturbance.

But I have become diverted somewhat from what I wanted to say with reference to underproduction. The fundamental cause of this unrest is underproduction of the necessities and commodities of life; and the first thing to be done, so far as reconstruction is concerned, is to organize every nation for its utmost possible production of commodities and necessities. Of course, that means the prompt return of the troops now on the battle field; it means the redistribution of many of those at home who have taken the places of men who have gone to the front; it means the finding of employment for the men who come back from the front.

There is underproduction here, and this underproduction is causing misery and distress in many cases even in the families of men who are securing a very high nominal wage, for, after all, it is not the money wage which a man receives which determines the degree of comfort and pleasure which he shall enjoy, but it is the wage in commodities and necessities; so that a serious underproduction of commodities and necessities reduces the real wage regardless of what the nominal wage may be. The whole problem, I say, of the reconstruction period is as soon as possible to bring every nation by proper organization up to its full productive capacity. Of course, that is a question of employment.

How will this system which I propose operate so far as employment and unemployment are concerned? I said yesterday that there was no means by which the Employment Bureau of the Federal Department of Labor could function properly until it knew how many unemployed there were in the country and who they were; and I think I showed conclusively, although I did not go into the question exhaustively, that there were no means available by which the Employment Bureau of the Department of Labor could ascertain the number, names, and qualifications of those unemployed. Under the system which I propose the record card of every citizen would be placed upon a file in the Federal census office at the county seat of this county. In the same building there would also be a branch of the Federal Employment Bureau, and if any man in the county became unemployed, or if any woman who wanted employment should become unemployed because of the return of a soldier to take her position, all that would be necessary for that man or woman to do would be to take a card, which could be obtained from the postmaster, and upon the card write the name and number and drop it in the box; for instance, "Mary Smith, No. so-and-so, unemployed." That card would be received by the official in charge of the subdivision office at the county seat where the Federal Employment Bureau would be located, and the card would be transferred to the unemployment file; and in every county every citizen of the county who was unemployed would have his card upon the unemployment file. Of course, those cards would constitute the records of the local division of the Federal Employment Agency so far as the informational end might be concerned.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. While the Senator is on that question I wish to ask him does he know how many men are now out of employment in the United States? I will answer my own question, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. FRANCE. I will be very glad to have some information on that point, because we have little information whatever on it which is accurate.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. Morrison, the secretary of the American Federation of Labor, testified to-day before the House Committee on Immigration, giving the figures as to the number of unemployed in the different cities, which I will say to the Senator is a constantly increasing number. I have the figures as to the different cities here. Altogether the number runs over 200,000 now unemployed in this country; yet no effort is being made anywhere, nothing is being done by Congress, to meet that situation. Has the Senator in his study of this matter and in his philosophy—because the Senator is a good deal of a philosopher—worked out any plan of taking care of that question in the immediate future?

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator, in reply to his inquiry, and by way of making an observation upon his most important contribution to this subject—and, of course, the Senator's contributions to this general subject are always most valuable, because he is one of the men in this body who is taking a particular interest in the great problem of reconstruction generally, in the problem of employment and unemployment, and in all problems which lie close to the heart of the people of this Republic—I will say to the Senator that I contemplate——

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, one word before the Senator passes from that point. May I ask what plans, so far as the Senator from Maryland knows and so far as the Senator from Iowa knows, are being put forth to take care of nonemployment locally or by the States?

Mr. KENYON. I wish to get the view or knowledge of the Senator from Maryland on that subject. I have some knowledge about it myself, but I thought possibly the Senator from Maryland might have some additional knowledge.

Mr. FRANCE. I will tell the Senator what I have in mind; and if the Senator from Vermont will permit me to answer the question of the Senator from Iowa, I shall then be very glad to answer his question. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that immediately the census begins—and it could begin, in my judgment, in a very few weeks, because what I propose is to do on a national scale what Gen. Crowder did when he enrolled so quickly and so expeditiously millions of our men for the purpose of the draft law—as soon as the census work begins these cards will be written, and the moment a card is written for a man who is unemployed it will be put in the unemployment file of his census subdivision office; and at Washington we will then know exactly every morning, if we wish to know that quickly, by telegraphic communication just how many unemployed men there are in every county and legislative district in the United States, and also who they are and what qualifications they possess.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator's card system contemplate showing the particular work that these men are fitted to do?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes. I have passed over much that I would have said if time had permitted.

Mr. KENYON. There is plenty of time.

Mr. FRANCE. The card will be so filled out that it will give a complete record of the individual, his past occupation, his education, his trade. It will be, I may say, somewhat similar to the cards made out under the direction of the Provost Marshal General at the last registration of soldiers for the Army, which cards carried a very large amount of information as to the qualifications of the individual. Every card of an unemployed man which would be transferred to the unemployment file in the local subdivision office would tell exactly what the man's trade and qualifications were. If he were a farmer, it would be so noted; if he were a man who had two or three trades, that would be noted; and we would have accumulating, as soon as the system was put in operation in every subdivision census office of the country, the unemployment cards.

I want to say that that is very important, because it must be obvious to every Senator that at a time like this the rapid accumulation of unemployment cards upon the files of the Census Bureau—or the employment bureau, because that employment file would be the employment bureau, so far as the information concerning unemployment was concerned—would indicate a serious situation. I need hardly emphasize that it is most important that if those cards should be accumulating at any very great rate at a time like this it would be proof that something must be done to reduce the number of those unemployed; and there is the very essence of the whole matter. If we know what sort of people are unemployed, who they are, what their qualifications are, and where they are, then we can legislate intelligently as to finding them work to do.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FRANCE. If the Senator will permit me to answer the question of the Senator from Vermont, I will yield in a moment.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. FRANCE. So far as what is being done now is concerned, I would say that in my judgment nothing efficient is being done. In fact, as I said yesterday, referring to the President's farewell speech, I think there is a general disposition on the part of the administration to feel that these questions will work themselves out. Nothing, I think, is being done except an attempt to speed up the Federal employment bureaus which are now a part of the Department of Labor; and I would say that those employment bureaus are making an effort to solve this problem of unemployment, but they can not do it, because they have not the data so far as unemployment is concerned.

Mr. PAGE. But the point I want to bring to the attention of the Senator from Maryland is this: Is there not a work that may be linked up with the work on the part of the States, so that there may be not a duplication altogether? We know now that passing from the east to the west there is a zone, perhaps covering the Central States from east to west, where the number of unemployed is daily increasing.

Mr. FRANCE. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. On the other hand, so far as my own State is concerned I do not know that there is any unemployment there. If so, it has not come to the front, and we take care of it locally. Indeed, I would say that that matter would be taken care of locally in small States like Vermont; and the point is that there should be a coordination of work, so that there is not any more burden thrown upon the National Government than is necessary in order to produce good results from the local work of the States.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator has raised some very interesting questions. Of course I feel that the problem of unemployment, for the very reason given by the Senator, is not a local problem. There are areas to-day in the United States where workers are needed. There are areas where workers are being dismissed. Now, if we had a Federal system which was rational and scientific, from the areas where there was a congestion those unemployed men could be taken to the areas where there was a dearth of workers, and a redistribution could take place which would be of benefit to all.

The theory of the Federal employment bureau is that this question of unemployment has ceased to be a local question and therefore that it must be dealt with by a national agency. I am not contending in this argument for the establishment of any new agencies, but for the application of scientific methods in the agencies which now exist—that is, the Federal employment bureaus.

Mr. PAGE. Do we not all agree that there should be a clearing house somewhere through which we may move to the different zones or the different localities where there is a surplus of work or a surplus of employees?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes; we do. I think the Senator and I are agreed that there should be such a clearing house, and that clearing house under my plan would by a scientifically and efficiently organized Federal employment bureau in the place of one which is inefficiently and unscientifically organized. I think the Senator and I are in agreement.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator right there, as he is right on this question, which is so interesting, permit the insertion and reading at this time of the figures given by Secretary Morrison to-day before the House committee as to unemployment right now in this country?

Mr. FRANCE. I should be very happy to have those introduced as bearing upon what I have to say.

Mr. KENYON. This is a list of the different cities and the unemployed in those cities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Los Angeles, Cal	8,000

Mr. KENYON. My question was directed to the Senator not in any controversial spirit, because I am thoroughly in favor of what he is trying to do, and I am glad he is challenging the attention of the country and the Senate to his proposal; but that, I fear, is going to be too late. The reports to the Labor Department are that this unemployment is increasing every week. We have got to meet that question in some way in the immediate future. It seems to me the only way we can meet it is, in cooperation with the States, to do the necessary public works in times when labor is not in demand in industry.

I hope the Senator will address himself in his forceful way to this question, and try to awaken Congress out of its lethargy and apparent lack of vision and see what we are going to face. We are so busy taking care of all the affairs of the world that we as yet do not seem to have time to take care of the affairs of our own country.

Mr. FRANCE. I agree with the Senator, and I now yield with pleasure to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am sorry that I have been in important committee meetings, so that I have not been able to be here to hear the Senator; but it seems to me, from the drift of what I have heard since I came in, that what he is advocating now is exactly what European countries did a year to two years ago. Certainly before the armistice, as early as last spring, in Great Britain every man who was in the army, or every man who was engaged in war work, was listed, card indexed; his occupation was included in the index; a note was made as to whether he could return to his former employment when the war was over; and every condition surrounding that man was in the hands of proper governmental authority, and arrangements had been made to give the man employment at the end of the war.

The Senator may recall that as long ago as last September I introduced in the Senate a resolution——

Mr. FRANCE. Does the Senator recall the date of it?

Mr. WEEKS. I should think the 25th of September I introduced in the Senate a resolution which is sleeping the sleep which knows no waking, apparently, in the Judiciary Committee, which provided for this suggested action and a great many other things. We as a Government—and I can not believe that the responsibility is on this side of the Chamber—are deliberately neglecting to prepare for the things which are inevitable. In other words, we are in this fatal condition in the way of preparedness for peace just as we were in preparedness for war; and while we have lost valuable time, unless the Senator from Maryland and other Senators and all the Senators stir up this matter now and some action is taken, we are going to have great distress in the United States, and distress that will be directly chargeable to the neglect of Congress.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to say, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, that I am in entire agreement with him; and, indeed, during all of the time that I have been considering these amendments to the census bill, which I consider to be a step in the direction of solving some of these reconstruction problems, my mind has been recurring to the great reconstruction program outlined by the Senator from Massachusetts last September, a program the timeliness of which and the breadth and comprehensiveness of which was only one more evidence of what we have all come to realize who know him, that in the Senator from Massachusetts we have a great statesman who has vision, who can look forward as well as to history. It is regrettable—indeed, to me it seems inexcusable—that the great reconstruction program outlined by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] was referred to a committee and allowed to sleep in that committee, because there seems to be in this administration an utter blindness to the seriousness of the situation which is rapidly developing in this reconstruction period which is not now all ahead of us, but which is about us, for we are in the very midst of it. Of course, if affirmative action had been taken with reference to the constructive suggestions contained in that great program of reconstruction presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, it would not be necessary for me to be thus contending here for this measure, which I consider to be but one step—perhaps an ineffective and a small step, but at least some step—in the direction of some reconstruction work and a more effective and rational organization of the Nation.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him once more, I might have added some additional reasons for the particular action which he now desires taken.

I saw in the War Department very nearly three weeks ago a chart prepared by the Department of Labor relative to idleness in the United States, and that chart at that time showed that in 31 per cent of the industrial centers there was a surplus of labor; that there was a scarcity of labor in about 20 per cent of the places, and about a normal amount in 49 per cent. Now, since that time we have discharged more than 500,000 men from the Army. We have discharged a great many people who were engaged in war work. For instance, one arms company has discharged, at different points where it manufactures, something like 18,000 people, so that any figure which states that there are 200,000 idle men in this country is very much below the probable fact.

I have a letter this morning from Springfield, Mass., an industrial center, which states that there are in that city now, a place of 75,000 people, very nearly 400 unemployed soldiers. They have not even been paid the 30 days' additional pay which Congress contemplates giving them; and those men, in some cases, are in the condition of real suffering. And yet these men, who have rushed to the colors, are returning to their homes and finding themselves out of employment and with no prospect or no concerted means of giving them employment. I venture to believe that that condition exists all over the United States, and I believe as thoroughly as I can that every bit of it could have been avoided if any reasonable attempt had been made to make preparations for what was inevitable, and that was an armistice and peace.

Mr. FRANCE. I thank the Senator for the observation, and I think that his judgment upon this question is most valuable. I find myself in entire agreement with him in the opinion which he has expressed, that the 200,000 unemployed men referred to constitute but a fraction of all of those unemployed. Offhand, I should say that probably to-day in the country there are nearer a million to a million and a half persons who have recently been employed who are to-day unemployed, and this in the face of the situation to which I have alluded, demanding the utmost production of all the necessities and commodities of life in order that a serious world situation may be met.

Mr. President, I have attempted briefly to outline how this system would work practically. Of course, it is very difficult in a short time to give an adequate conception of such an extensive plan as this. I have quite a number of other observations to submit. I do not know what the plans of the chairman of the committee are with reference to the hour of adjournment to-day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have been very much impressed with the arguments of the Senator from Maryland and with his presentation of his very comprehensive amendments. I think that there are many meritorious features about them, and I am entirely willing to have them adopted by the Senate and go to conference, in order that they may be thoroughly studied. Therefore, I shall say that the amendments are accepted, and I hope the Senator will now offer them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendments will be accepted.

Mr. FRANCE. I appreciate the acceptance by the chairman and the adoption by the Senate of these amendments; and, of course, I feel also that in view of this there will be no propriety in my detaining the Senate further in the discussion of the general problem of national and of world reconstruction. I have quite a mass of interesting data on the subject of the public health, on the subject of illiteracy in the United States, on the inefficiency of our systems of public education, on the subject of unemployment and of poverty, and some very interesting data also with reference to the conditions in the various countries of the world which I had thought of discussing, such as the conditions in Russia, in Africa, in Bulgaria, in Ireland, and in India, all of which should very properly be considered to be pertinent to this question of national and of world reconstruction. Inasmuch, however, as the Senator has accepted my amendments, I shall be very glad to yield the floor.

I hope, however, that the Senator will do all in his power in conference to secure a consideration of this question. It is,

I may say, a practical plan, a scientific plan, and one which I think all the members of the committee must realize has merit, and one which the experts in charge of the Census Bureau must look upon with some degree of interest. I want to say further that of course in offering these amendments I have not been casting any reflections upon the Census Committee, or upon the head of the Census Bureau, for whom I have the very highest regard. He is a man of ability and of great scientific attainments; but I realize that all changes in the census law are made slowly, and only after protracted effort and debate. The history of the census, to which I had intended referring at some length, shows this.

I hope that the Senator, when this matter goes to conference, will make a fight for these amendments. If, however, he can not persuade the conferees that all of these particular amendments should be added to the bill at this time—and I admit that there might be reasons why they should not be; personally I think they should be, but there might be valid arguments why it might seem to be somewhat revolutionary at this time to put all of these amendments upon this bill—I wish to suggest this to the chairman: I feel that if the conferees should refuse to adopt this whole plan, the Senator should at least make a most strenuous effort, as a member of the conference committee, to have some amendment added in the place of mine, if they should be rejected, which will provide that a commission of experts shall be appointed for the consideration of this whole matter which I have presented.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to assure the Senator that his amendments will not only have thorough and earnest consideration at the hands of the conference committee, but that his last suggestions shall also have our most careful study. The conferees will be glad to have the Senator appear before them when we take up the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments of the Senator from Maryland will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill is in the Committee of the Whole, and still open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committe of the Whole.

RECESS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate take a recess until noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 17, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 16, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, for the preservation of our lives; the opportunities spread out before us; for thought, reflection, accomplishments.

Help us to think clearly, act wisely, do justly, that with the tools Thou hast given us we may build for ourselves a character which will stand the test of time and eternity. In the Spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE CHARLES MARTIN, OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, February 2, 1919, be set aside for memorial services on the life, character, and public services of Hon. CHARLES MARTIN, deceased, late a Member of this House from the State of Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY] asks unanimous consent that Sunday, February 2, 1919, be set aside for memorializing his predecessor, the late Representative MARTIN, of Illinois. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14078, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Legislative reference: To enable the Librarian of Congress to employ competent persons to gather, classify, and make available, in translations, indexes, digests, compilations, and bulletins, and otherwise, data for or bearing upon legislation, and to render such data serviceable to Congress and committees and Members thereof, $30,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $3,000 per annum.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of announcing that, through the courtesy of the United Press, I am able to state that the thirty-sixth State has ratified the prohibition amendment. My native State of Nebraska ratified the amendment this morning. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Distribution of card indexes: For service in connection with distribution of card indexes and other publications of the Library: Chief of division, $3,000; chief assistant, $1,800; assistants—2 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,500 each, 3 at $1,400 each, 4 at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,100 each, 4 at $1,000 each; for services of assistants at salaries less than $1,000 per annum and for piecework and work by the hour, $19,500, including not exceeding $500 for freight charges, expressage, traveling expenses connected with such distribution, and expenses of attendance at meetings when incurred on the written authority and direction of the Librarian, $49,400.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to give me his attention for a moment. I had intended to ask him at the time we passed the appropriation for the Committee on Printing whether he had any information as to why such inferior paper is used in the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. During the last few weeks the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has been printed upon paper that would not be acceptable in any newspaper office in the country under ordinary circumstances, and yet I observe that publications of the Bureau of Information and of the various departments appear in the regular way on glazed paper, apparently in the usual form. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a publication that ought to be preserved. Why is it printed upon such cheap paper at the present time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have no information that I can give to the gentleman upon the subject. I refer the gentleman to the chairman of the Committee on Printing. As a matter of fact, the Committee on Printing controls the paper, as I understand it, that is used in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and for Congress, and has no control over the paper that is used in the departments. I can only give the gentleman my opinion in regard to the matter, and that would not be worth anything since I have no definite information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman has no information I shall not pursue the subject further, but I would say that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is bound in permanent form and is preserved for future generations and for future Congresses. It ought to be preserved. It would be a great pity if the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of to-day were to disintegrate because of the quality of the paper upon which it is printed. One of the big problems that will confront this Nation before long will be the preservation of its old records.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I assume that the permanent RECORD will be printed upon better paper. These daily RECORDS are not permanent, nor are they expected to be. I presume that the reason this kind of paper is used for the daily RECORD is because of the scarcity of paper and the endeavor to economize.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman can not tell why it is that the Bureau of Public Information continues to put out its publications on glazed paper, while the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is printed upon paper that would disgrace the average newspaper office?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not. As I stated, I understand the Committee on Printing has nothing to do with the character of paper used by any of the executive departments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I see that the chairman of the Committee on Printing has entered the Hall, and I ask whether he can explain why it is that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is printed on such abominable paper as is used at the present time.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes, Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Printing can probably explain, but probably not to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as daily produced is temporary; it is not permanent. Under the allowance of printing granted by the Committee on Appropriations for Congress some two years ago, the estimate then was based on the probability that the paper to be used in printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would cost 4 cents a pound.

Between the time of the enactment of that appropriation bill in 1916 and the time of letting the contract in 1917 the cost of this paper had increased about 7 or 8 cents per pound. Another emergency arose, which was the inability of the mills to furnish book paper, for what reason the committee did not ascertain. It was given out that they were unable to furnish book and enameled papers, and therefore, in behalf of economy and in behalf of prompt service in the matter of getting the RECORD printed, we were compelled to take news print, and, so far as I am concerned, and my eyes are fairly good at my age, I have no difficulty in reading the temporary RECORD, but the permanent RECORD is made up of a lighter paper along the same lines that many of the publishers are resorting to, using paper of lighter weight for the reason that it does not incur so much bulk and saves money beside.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is strange to me that Henry Ford can obtain all the glazed paper that he wants for the publication of his paper, which has just appeared for the first time, or that Mr. George Creel can obtain all the glazed paper he wants for the publications which he is sending out by the millions, and this body can not. It is strange that all the great publishers can print their magazines on glazed paper when the Congress of the United States, which ought to preserve its permanent RECORDS, has to use paper which is not fit for an ordinary country newspaper office.

Mr. BARNHART. Well, that is a matter of opinion. The ordinary newspaper office does not use as good print paper as is used in the temporary RECORD, which is not intended for permanent use.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some of it is not as good as that, I admit, but I submit to the gentleman that the paper upon which the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is printed now is not fit for official use and will dissolve in due course. Members of the House, to whom fifty-odd copies are allotted, are entitled to obtain RECORDS for permanent use if they desire to do so. The RECORD as it goes out to-day to our constituents is as cheap a publication as you will see in any newspaper office in the country. It is a disgrace to the Congress of the United States, and I respectfully submit to the gentleman that he should use his influence with the Committee on Printing or with the contractors or with Congress, if you please, to put the permanent RECORD of the United States Congress on paper that will not fall apart.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOTANIC GARDEN.

For superintendent, $2,250.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to increase the salary of the superintendent of the Botanic Garden to $3,250.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. AUSTIN: Page 27, line 23, strike out "$2,250" and insert "$3,250."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, here is a great national botanical garden of a country representing more than 100,000,000 people, and this appropriation is wholly inadequate; it is unfair; it is unjust. We are carrying in this appropriation bill a salary for a clerk of $3,000, an assistant clerk of $2,220, and we are actually paying messengers in this bill $1,440, which is only $810 less than we are paying the superintendent of the Botanic Garden. We are making an appropriation of $3,600 for salary of the superintendent of the Library buildings and grounds, which is $1,350 more than we are paying the superintendent of the Botanic Garden. The superintendent in the Treasury Department, in the redemption bureau, national currency, is paid $3,500, and the superintendent of the Botanic Garden $2,250, or a difference of $1,250. Now, I know that there is no existing law and that this proposed amendment is subject to a point of order, but it is an inequality, and this underpay has stood here for many years, and the responsibility of this position should carry with it an increased compensation, and I do hope that my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will give the House an opportunity to vote upon my proposed amendment. Now, I know all of these amendments have so far met with a point of order and have gone out, or the House given no opportunity, but if there is a case, an exceptional case, from the beginning to the end of this bill, it is this case; and while perhaps the members of the Committee on Appropriations have an understanding that they are to resist all increases, I do trust, in the interest of fair play, that an exception will be made in this case.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The superintendent of the Botanic Garden is an exceedingly efficient and competent man; there is no question about that. He gives very close attention to his duties and is a man of splendid qualifications for the place. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] to this fact: His salary has been increased twice within the last two years. Two or three years ago his salary was $1,800. It was increased by $200 and then another $250, making a total of $450 given in the last two years. In addition to that, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the superintendent of the Botanic Garden is given a house in which to live free of charge. He is also supplied free of charge with heat, fuel, and light, which, of course, should be taken into consideration in connection with his salary. Now, there is another fact. The committee has recommended to the House a provision creating a joint commission, which shall reclassify and readjust the salaries paid here in the District of Columbia. If that provision is accepted by the House and becomes a law, then the commission will take this salary under consideration in connection with other salaries, and if it is inequitable or insufficient, as the gentleman suggests, the joint commission will report an increase, and I hardly think it proper now, in view of the fact that this commission is to be appointed, to undertake to increase his salary here in this bill and——

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (continuing). I shall have to insist upon my point of order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me say to the gentleman, in reply to his statement, of course, that was an extraordinary increase in this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an extension of two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. Of course, that was a remarkable increase in a salary, of $200 a year of an insufficiently paid Government official—from $1,800 to $2,000—and an additional advance of $400. The gentleman has referred to the fact that the superintendent is furnished a house. I wish to say that I think that is an additional reason why his pay should be increased, in view of the fact that you are compelling him to live in that undesirable house. I do not believe that the increases already made will meet the superintendent's doctor bill in occupying that house; and I doubt whether there has been a month, and I am certain six months have never passed, when there has not been illness in that family. It is a very old house. It is a low, damp place, and you really ought to increase the superintendent's compensation and pay him something in addition for living in a house of that character. And I hope the gentleman will let this amendment be voted upon. If no point of order is made against the creation of his commission on reclassification, I am perfectly willing to let it remain. But the provision creating a commission is also subject to a point of order, and if we pass this provision now without increasing the salary and a point of order is sustained against the commission no relief will be granted even at a later day. The superintendent of the Botanic Garden is an exceptional man for that position and should receive an adequate salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do this for the purpose of calling attention to what I regard as an exceptional performance on the part of the House yesterday.

Yesterday morning certain standing committees of this House were refused clerks during this session of the Congress on the theory that it was necessary in the interest of economy. I stated at that time that I had no complaint to make. I am making none now. I am only desiring to call attention to this somewhat incongruous action on the part of this House. These committees were refused clerks, as I say, in the interest of economy, so it was said; and the report of the Committee on Accounts seemed to receive the support of a large majority of the Members present at that time. Before the legislative day had expired, in fact within a few hours from that time, there was an amendment adopted to this bill giving each Member an extra clerk at a salary of $1,200 a year.

Seven standing committees of the House were denied clerks for this session of three months which will effect a saving to the Government of the magnificent sum of $2,625. This was done, it was said, in the interest of economy, and yet within a few hours from that time these same economists, or some of them, at least, voted to pay out of the Treasury over one-half million of dollars a year for an extra clerk for themselves.

O Consistency, thou art a jewel.

Perhaps it is not generally known by the membership of the House that the chairmen of these expenditures committees, all but three of which were left out yesterday, have not been permitted to participate in the patronage of this House. Some three or four years ago the Democratic caucus met and took from the chairmen of these different expenditures committees all patronage on the part of this House, on the theory that they had patronage in the person of the clerks of their committees—their session clerks. Now, that was taken away yesterday.

I am going out of this Congress on the 4th of March. It makes absolutely no difference to me, but it seems to me that this House ought to be fair; it ought to be just; it ought, at least, to be consistent. At 1 o'clock on yesterday you refused these clerks to these commitees because it was an unnecessary expense, you said, and, perchance, some chairmen of these committees might use these clerks to aid them in their personal work as Members of Congress, but at about 4.30 or 5 o'clock the same afternoon this same membership grew generous, forgot the interests of the Treasury, and added an additional burden of $522,000 a year on the Treasury to hire an extra clerk for each Member of the House. In doing that I realize that you have put in jeopardy the $2,000 you are allowed now for a clerk, because it certainly puts the whole matter back where it started, and it is all subject to a point of order if anybody cares to make it. Twelve hundred dollars a year is all that the permanent law allows for clerks to Members.

I only wanted to call your attention to these facts and to suggest that it seems to me, above everything else, the House ought to be fair, and it ought to be just, and it ought to be consistent. The situation in which you leave my friend from Oklahoma, who is chairman of one of these committees, and others similarly situated, is that with all the extra work piling on the Members of the House, as referred to yesterday, due to war conditions, leaves him and them without any assistance other than their one clerk. Perhaps it is right. I shall not worry about it.

Now, if the committee will permit me just a few minutes, as that is all I want to say on this subject, I want to discuss——

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman understands quite well that the increase of the salaries of clerks to Members is not permanently in this bill. It has got to be voted on by the House when it comes out of the Committee of the Whole, and in all probability will be rejected there, and I hope it will.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is true; and it is also subject to a point of order if anybody wants to make it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like permission to say a few words, perhaps somewhat out of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask that I may have five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have heard a great deal of criticism of the War Department recently. I am in sympathy with many of those criticisms, but I want to suggest to the membership of the House that even in those matters we ought to be charitable, we ought to be reasonable; we must be just. We ought to be fair in that as in everything else. It seems to me that we can not get away from the proposition that the War Department has recently put through one of the most tremendous undertakings in the history of the world. I undertake to say that no Nation in the world has ever equipped an Army such as we have equipped, supplied it with all the necessities, transported more than 2,000,000 of its soldiers 3,000 miles across the sea, and done it within the time the War Department has performed that task. We ought not to overlook that fact in our criticisms. It will stand as a monument to the War Department as long as this Government stands.

Again, I want to suggest that there have been mistakes made, of course. It is not within the possibilities of human nature not to have made some mistakes under these fortuitous circumstances. And I am not here to apologize for any of the mistakes that may have been made carelessly, certainly not purposely, but I am only asking that we be fair and just with the department.

There have come to my knowledge some matters that have not been pleasing and which seem to me to be subject to criticism.

Only within the last few days I got notice of the fact that a father living in my district was notified by the War Department that his son was killed in action on July 18, 1918. The father writes me that he has heard from the son several times since July 18. Consequently, evidently the War Department made a distressing error. It also came to my knowledge that while the father has been hearing from the son, the son has never heard from his father or from any of his family since last May.

The War Department was called upon by me under the circumstances to cable this son. In his letter to his father he asked the question, "Why can I not hear from you? Are you all dead? I have not heard a word from you since last May." Under those circumstances I asked The Adjutant General to cable to this boy, conveying to him the message that his folks were alive, and to get direct information from this boy as to his present condition. At first he declined to do it, but subsequently agreed that under the circumstances he would do it.

Now, for any of those carelessnesses, if they are due to carelessness, I have no kind of an apology. They ought to be criticized. They ought to improve. But the criticisms which, I fear, are sometimes made upon this floor for partisan purposes only are to be deprecated and should never be indulged in. And if anybody here believes that he is going to be able to get away with criticisms of that kind he is very much mistaken. He is not going to fool the boys, especially those who have been in the war. They are suspecting your motives already. I have a letter in my pocket here from a gentleman whom I know well, a lawyer, but an enlisted man in this Army, who also fought through the Spanish-American War, a very high-class man, but a Republican "from who laid the chunk." He is a personal friend of mine, but I have reason to believe that he never voted for me in his life because I was not on his ticket. He is that kind of a Republican. I am not at liberty to give his name, but I will show his letter to any gentleman who wants to see it. He is writing me on a business matter, but in his letter he says this:

As you well know, I have been, and am yet, a Republican. I haven't scratched a ticket for many years; but doubtless my party will make some desperate efforts to discredit the present administration, and especially the War Department, but you can take it from me, who has soldiered as an enlisted man through two wars—the Spanish-American and this one—that there is no comparison between the two. In the Spanish War we received no medical attention unless sick, and then but very little, as the death rate of that war shows. In this war we were watched close, examined once a week, whether sick or well. Our battalion of 600 men has had only one death, and that the result of accident. The enlisted men were all provided with plenty of bedding and cots to sleep on—an unheard of thing in the Spanish War. It was sleep on the ground or nothing. Result: But little rheumatism or fever contracted; and our food has been of the very best, well cooked, and plentiful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Where did that man serve?

Mr. HAMLIN. His letter does not state, but I know that he did not have a swivel-chair job.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, in opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], I wish to say that his argument about the needs of these committees on expenditures and his own committee does not at all appeal to me. I rather respect the gentleman, because he did not go before the Committee on Accounts and claim that his committee was going to be active. Personally, I do not believe any committees on expenditures are going to be active in this Congress, and I am afraid that that is a disposition which they never will exercise unless they belong to a party antagonistic to the administration.

I remember the gentleman's committee when, as he says, it was very active. I have a vague recollection of its results; and while I think, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] remarked yesterday, that undoubtedly in the next Congress these committees will be active, I hope they will, none of them, be active in such a narrow and partisan and unfair way as my recollection is of the results of the gentleman's committee before. But as a matter of fact every expenditures committee will always be inclined to shield abuses of its own administration, and I have no doubt the same pressure would influence a Republican committee when there was a Republican administration, although, of course, I do not think there would be so much to conceal then as there is now.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. I believe the gentleman has been a very honored and influential Member of this House for about 22 years, has he not?

Mr. GILLETT. I have been a Member longer than that.

Mr. HAMLIN. During the time that the Republican Party was in power in this House, which was practically all of that time except the last five years——

Mr. GILLETT. Ten years.

Mr. HAMLIN. We took possession in 1911.

Mr. GILLETT. Eight years, then.

Mr. HAMLIN. During all the time the Republican Party was in power, did not the gentleman's party give clerks to all these committees at every session of Congress?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think so, but I do not remember.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the RECORD will show that you did. And is it not true that the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, at least—I do not speak for the others—did not having a single meeting, barring, perhaps, one session one day, during all the time the gentleman was a Member of this House, except at the time the committees grew active under the Democratic control?

Mr. GILLETT. I think, Mr. Chairman, very likely that is true, and I have always said that I do not believe that these committees will ever function except when they belong to the party opposite to the party in power.

I am not sure about these committee clerks. It may be that they did have them, but we all remember, when the Democratic Party came into power in this House eight years ago, they came out with a program of criticism of these committees, and said they were going to reform and not have these useless clerks. I remember that we all said on this side at the time that that sounded very well, but predicted it would not last very long, and we have all seen that platform of economy, which I believe was sincere at the time, gradually fade away.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman is a little bit in error about the policy of the majority in control when we came into power. We did not say that we would not give clerks to standing committees, but that we would abolish useless committees, and my recollection is that we abolished either three or five.

Mr. GILLETT. You abolished a few, but you also cut down expenses and abolished salaries very creditably. I think it needed to be done; but, as I say, you have gradually lapsed right back into the bad habit of which, perhaps, you had an example before you.

Mr. HAMLIN. The bad example which the Republican Party had set.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; I will agree that we had drifted into a condition of having committees which did not function and of having some unnecessary clerks, and I regret to see you on that side drifting back into that same condition. I am sorry that your high-flown professions have not been lived up to.

But, Mr. Chairman, what I was leading up to was that I think the best remedy for this is to have one permanent and active committee along the lines advocated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE], a permanent committee which shall always consist of a majority opposed to the administration, so that there will be one committee on expenditures in this House which shall always have a partisan motive to criticize the administration and therefore will always be at least a constraining force on the administration, inasmuch as the administration will know that there is a body here which is always disposed to watch and criticize them; and I regret extremely that when in the last session we tried to have a committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war, of which a majority would be Democrats, and that side of the House as well as this side were, I think, disposed to favor it, a letter came from the President opposing it, and that side of the House, obedient to the request of the President, at once abandoned the project.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT. I shall be very glad to hear the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I am going to agree with the gentleman's latter remarks very largely, and I make this suggestion: I know from experience that one reason why some of these expenditure committees have not been any more active than they have been is that the Committee on Appropriations very largely perform the work that the rules of the House contemplated would be done by these committees on expenditures in the various departments.

Mr. GILLETT. The Committee on Appropriations can not do it all, it is too absorbingly busy, but we do as much as we can, because these committees on expenditures in the various departments do not do it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not agree with the gentleman in the statement he has just made. The Committee on Appropriations does this work, and then the Committees on Expenditures feel that they are simply duplicating the work. Now, I believe, and have believed for a good while, that the best thing to do is to abolish these expenditures committees, and either have one committee on expenditures to cover the whole subject or else let the Committee on Appropriations do that work and hold them responsible for it. I do not believe you ought to have these committees unless you are going to equip them so that they may work if they choose to do so.

Mr. GILLETT. I am rather inclined to agree to the gentleman's proposition that perhaps one committee could take the place of all these various committees on expenditures, though I anticipate that in the next Congress, in revealing the extravagances and failures of the present administration, we will need them all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to discuss this question at any length. I am a member of one of the expenditure committees. My only object in rising is to correct the incorrect statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] so far as it applies to me, with reference to the committee of which I am a member having been called off. It is not my fault that the committee of which I am a member has not discharged its duty, and it is not the fault altogether of the Democratic side either.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman what the committee is of which he is chairman?

Mr. WINGO. The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

I realize that this is hardly the time to discuss this question. It is too late to do anything in the few weeks left to this Congress. At some later date I will have something to say about it, and will put into the RECORD some correspondence which will show my position on the matter, and the statements made to me by gentlemen in authority on both sides of the aisle when I consulted them with reference to my committee discharging its duty.

It is unfortunate that we did not do one of two things, either put these committees to work or else abolish them.

When it is suggested that we put our committee to work, we are told that the appropriating committees are investigating these subjects, and then when you ask one of the appropriating committees to take up any specific item of expenditure that ought to be investigated you are immediately told that they are overwhelmed with work and that they have a hard time getting the supply bills in here on time, which is true.

The truth of the matter is these appropriating committees have all they can do to make the necessary investigation to show the need for the items that are called for in the pending estimates for future expenditures with no time to investigate past expenditures.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. In just a moment. You ought to have expenditures committees engaged in the work of watching to see whether or not the appropriations have been properly expended. Then when the appropriating committees came to consider estimates for the future it would be of great assistance to them to have the facts collected and presented to them by the committee on expenditures in the various departments, showing how the same estimating officials have expended the funds appropriated upon the former estimates, which the appropriating committees were compelled to accept.

Mr. GILLETT. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT. I should like to know what the gentleman means by the House putting these committees to work. The House can not set them to work. A committee can go to work or not, as it pleases.

Mr. WINGO. Every time it has been suggested during my membership in this House, either on the floor or in private consultation, that we go to work, gentlemen on both sides very promptly give their judgment that we should not do it. At least, that has been my experience. I have been told that we better not do it, and that has not been told me by Democratic leaders alone but by Republican leaders as well. The only way to put them to work is to give them some authority. They have no authority. The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department has not a bit of authority to discharge the duties for which it is supposed to be appointed. What you ought to do is to give these expenditures committees authority to send for persons, books, and papers and allow them to make proper expenditures, and give them proper clerical assistance, and make them discharge their duties. If you do that, and they go about it in a legitimate way, not in a muckraking way, in a legitimate businesslike way, to check up expenditures, they could save millions of dollars every year and could assist Members of the House in considering appropriation bills and give them facts that would be valuable. The trouble has been in the past that they have been purely little committees that somebody might be made chairman of, but when it is suggested that we give them help then somebody raises a cry that some one else wants an extra stenographer. I hope that the party that is coming in power will either abolish them or else bring in resolutions at the beginning of each session that will give these committees power to send for books, persons, and papers, and that it will direct them to go to work, and if they need any further assistance then let them go before the Committee on Accounts; and if you do that and pursue an honest investigation, instead of a muckraking, partisan investigation, you will be able to save millions of dollars to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. My attention has just been called to the fact that prior to the Sixty-first Congress these committees were not only given clerks, whether they worked or not, but the clerks were paid $6 a day, or $180 a month. In the Sixty-first Congress the resolution was brought in cutting them down to $125 a month. So that while this House was under the control of the Republican Party these committees had clerks at $180 a month.

Mr. WINGO. I am not undertaking to go into the partisan phase of it. My object in rising was not to talk about investigating affairs in any department from a partisan standpoint, and it is one of the shames of this House that the only way we do treat these expenditure committees is either as patronage committees or as muck-raking committees. We ought to get away from that and put them to work in a nonpartisan, businesslike way. It is not my fault that the expenditures in the War Department were not checked up as the expenditures were made. If I had had my way, the Expenditure Committee, of which I am a member, would have discharged its duty. But my statements of facts, made not alone in letters urging action, not alone in consultation with those responsible, but in debate on this floor, were ignored. I have at all times urged action and have been ready, willing, and anxious for the committee to exercise its functions and to ask for authority to force production of persons, books, and papers and to sit anywhere.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is mistaken about these committees having power. The committees on expenditures have just as much power granted to them as the Committee on Appropriations to obtain testimony.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I will say that the gentleman himself is one of the authorities I gave when I took the question up. I consulted him and a couple of more gentleman upon that side, and I did not find a single parliamentarian on the floor of the House who did not think it was necessary for us to bring in a special resolution in order to enforce attendance of witnesses and production of books and papers. I may have misunderstood the gentleman, but I went to him for counsel on the matter.

Mr. MANN. I never have advised the gentleman, so far as I know, that it was necessary for him to bring in a special resolution. I have repeatedly stated to members of various committees on expenditures that they did have authority to send for anybody they pleased. They would not have authority to bring anybody in contempt without a resolution of the House. Neither has the Committee on Appropriations nor the Committee on Ways and Means. No committee of the House has any greater power over matters confided to it by the rules than have the committees on expenditures. Of course, if the Committee on Appropriations sends for some one and he refuses to come they have no way of enforcing the presence of such a person without obtaining authority from the House. If the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department sends for the Secretary of War and he declines to come, it could not force his attendance without obtaining authority from the House, but that authority would readily be granted to any committee which makes a proper request for the attendance of any officer of the Government or anyone else. Committees on expenditures have wide jurisdiction. I do not think it was desirable for the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department at the beginning of the war to commence to hamper the War Department in reference to expenditures. I am frank to say that now ,and I frankly said it at the time, to members of the Committee on Expenditures of the War Department. I do not think it was desirable to try to prevent the War Department from proceeding with the expenditure of money, sometimes regardless of rules, and I say sometimes regardless of law, but I think the committees can properly work without obtaining additional authority from Congress. When a committee wants to get special authority my observation has been that it has never had any trouble with the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said touching the power these respective committees have. They have just as much power as any other committee in the House. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in the Forty-fourth Congress the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department had as its chairman the late Senator Blackburn, of Kentucky. It was a very lively committee. That is the committee that reported the resolution impeaching the Secretary of War.

The House impeached him and the Senate tried him. It is true that he was acquitted, but if the committees on expenditures see proper to do it they can do a great deal of work.

The Clerk read as follows:

For procuring manure, soil, tools, fuel, purchasing trees, shrubs, plants, and seeds; services, including skilled laborers and laborers at rates to be fixed by the superintendent; materials, and miscellaneous supplies; traveling expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence of the superintendent and his assistants not to exceed $300; street car fares not exceeding $25; office equipment, and contingent expenses in connection with repairs and improvements to Botanic Gardens; exchange, care, and maintenance of motor-propelled delivery vehicles; purchase of periodicals not to exceed $50; all under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, $18,000.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 15, after the word "vehicles" insert the words "removal of wall."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. I wish to say just a word or two. There is no question but that when the Grant Monument is completed and the bronze statue is placed on the marble pedestal that has been awaiting it these many years the present wall about the Botanic Garden will have to be removed. But the grounds of the Botanic Garden are in charge of the superintendent. The Mall, immediately to the west, is under the charge of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds. Provision is made in this bill for guards to supervise and police the Mall. If we should remove the wall we would have to make appropriation for it, and also would have to provide keepers or guards to police the grounds during the night. At the present time the gates are locked at sundown.

Quite frequently in the past has this subject of the removal of this fence been under consideration. It is rather ancient, I agree. It is similar in its design to that which surrounds the White House grounds. But until some definite plan has been determined as to its removal and as to whether the Botanic Garden should be removed to some more fitting place, I think we should not provide for the removal of the fence in this way. And therefore I make the point of order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he is informed why the monument is not completed, and how long it will be before it is completed?

Mr. STAFFORD. The marble pedestal has been completed, I believe, for five or six years, awaiting the erection of the equestrian bronze statue.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wish to say that I have been here for eight years, and it has been just like that, except that one of those bronzes was put on there since I have been here.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is an instance of tempus fugit. I am surprised it has been so long. I remember, Mr. Chairman, when the authorization was made and the struggle was had on the floor of this House as to where we should locate the equestrian statue of Gen. Grant. Maybe the gentleman is correct that it was completed eight years ago. I can not give the gentleman any information as to that.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman from Wisconsin is a student of legislation and of the history of legislation in this House, I desire to ask him if it is not a fact that the Congress of the United States some 9 or 10 years ago ordered that wall to be removed, and that that order or that legislation is still in force, and that the wall was not removed simply because we had an excellent though self-willed gentleman in charge of it, a man who was a lover of flowers but whose special choice was the thistle, which immediately indicates his nationality or, at least, his lineage? His name was William R. Smith, who came in charge of the garden in 1854, under the magnificent salary of $50 a month. One of his fads was that that wall under no circumstances should be removed, and although Congress by special act ordered him to remove it, when he died the wall, like the Star-Spangled Banner, "was still there." We have felt like respecting his memory for all these years, but not "over long."

I want to say something about this Smith. The one flower above all others that seems to bloom down there is the memory of Smith. One of the things he insisted on was that a man in order to obtain flowers should demonstrate that he knew of Robert Burns and could quote his poetry. There was an occasion when a high-stationed officeholder tried to obtain some flowers from the garden for some state event. Smith promised him the flowers. But to impress it upon him, the Senator said, "As Jimmy Burns said." "As Jimmy Burns said?" interjected Smith. "Why don't you talk about Tommy Alexander, Billy Bonaparte, or Charlie Christ? You get no flowers from the Botanic Garden." [Laughter.]

Is it not a fact that that law still exists?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Is it subject to a point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. If, as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] states, there is a prior authorization of law, then it is not. But I assume, though I have no acquaintance with that act, it was an appropriation law, that expired with that year.

Mr. Chairman, I am rather authoritatively informed by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations that it was an appropriation for the removal of the fence and not a direction for its removal. Therefore, it being merely an appropriation for its removal, it would not be considered permanent law.

I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOUSTON). The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the President: Secretary, $7,500; executive clerk, $5,000; chief clerk, $4,000; appointment clerk, $3,500; record clerk, $2,500; two expert stenographers, at $2,500 each; accounting and disbursing clerk, $2,500; two correspondents, at $2,500 each; clerks—two at $2,500 each, four at $2,000 each, six of class 4, two of class 3, four of class 2, three of class 1; messengers—three at $900 each, three at $840 each; three laborers at $720 each; in all, $78,580: Provided, That employees of the executive departments and other establishments of the executive branch of the Government may be detailed from time to time to the office of the President of the United States for such temporary assistance as may be necessary.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, to me one of the saddest and most unfortunate incidents of the great war was the sinking of the transport, the ill-fated Otranto, off the coast of Scotland on the night of October 6, when several hundred of our brave young American boys went down to a watery grave, unknelled, uncoffined, and unsung. These brave young lads had almost reached the scene of war, where they hoped to share the honor and glory that awaited their comrades in arms. But Fate decreed otherwise. They had no chance to show to the world how brave they were. With unfaltering courage they walked out upon the decks of the stricken and sinking vessel and calmly faced their inevitable doom. They were boys, and in the language of a former distinguished Member of this House who has gone to his last reward, "Most of them when life was full of hope and all its tides were at their highest, grandest flow; just when the early sunbeams were falling on the steps of fame and flooding all life's landscape far into the dreamy, distant horizon; just at that age when all the nymphs were making diadems and garlands, weaving laurel wreaths before the eyes of young and eager nature—just then when death seemed most unnatural."

They were heroes as truly as those who were slain upon the field of battle, and we want their spirits to know that the memory of their heroism will be enshrined in our hearts so long as this Republic shall live. [Applause.]

Their untimely death to me is peculiarly sad, for half a hundred or more were from my district and 19 of those splendid boys came from my own county. All of the latter were my personal friends, and I loved them as my younger brothers.

A few weeks ago there appeared in the Sylvania Telephone, my home paper, an editorial describing the incident I have alluded to, and I will read it in my time:

A REAL HERO.

The great war has developed unnumbered heroes—on sea, on land, in the air—and when we think of the splendid and irresistible bravery of our boys and the magnificent heroism of the French and the unyielding courage of the British we are led to think of what the poet said of the combat on the plains of Troy, where if one could have viewed the whole battle field from above—

"The war's whole art with wonder had he seen
And counted heroes where he counted men."

But there is one gallant English officer whom our people here should remember with grateful hearts and whose heroic deed shines with peculiar luster to us, because he was the means of saving the lives of so many of our boys from this section. We refer to the lieutenant who commanded the destroyer that rescued so many of the soldiers from the ill-fated Otranto.

When the stricken transport was left alone to her doom in that wild and tempestuous sea this officer, regardless of his own safety and that of his boat and against the orders of the Otranto's captain, brought his little craft three times to the side of the larger vessel to rescue the men from their impending doom. When we remember that the wind was blowing a hurricane and that the waves were rolling nearly a hundred feet high we can form some idea perhaps of how perilous was the undertaking and how imminent the danger of destruction to the destroyer and all of her men.

But the lieutenant wavered not. With consummate skill his little boat was brought three times by the side of the sinking ship—sometimes far above her on the crest of a mighty wave and the next minute far below in the trough of the angry sea—and over 300 of our boys were saved from the cruel fate that overtook their comrades.

We don't know what his name is, though we hope some day to know, but he is a real hero, every inch of him, no matter who he is or where he came from.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY.

To enable the Bureau of Efficiency, authorized by the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved February 28, 1916, to establish and maintain a system of efficiency ratings, to investigate administrative needs of the service relating to personnel in the several executive departments and independent establishments, required by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1913 and 1914, respectively, and to investigate duplication of statistical and other work and methods of business in the various branches of the Government service; for purchase or exchange of equipment, supplies, stationery, books and periodicals, printing and binding, traveling expenses not exceeding $3,000, and street car fare not exceeding $50; in all, $125,000: Provided, That not more than nine persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $3,000 per annum.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand the Bureau of Efficiency is the bureau that has laid out the plans for adjusting the claims of the soldiers under the War Risk Bureau. If the efficiency of the War Risk Bureau is a sample of the knowledge and experience of the man who made the plans, then I am sorry to see an appropriation of $125,000 contained in this bill for the payment of those who are under his jurisdiction.

I understand that Mr. Brown, the head of the Bureau of Efficiency, last year was getting $5,000 and that without any authority of law he increased his own salary out of this lump-sum appropriation to $6,000. I do not see why we are making a lump-sum appropriation, why we do not specify the men, the positions, and the compensations to be paid to the men in this paragraph. There is no reason on earth why we should permit a man who is displaying so little knowledge in the matter of efficiency as the head of this bureau to fix the compensation of the men who are employed under him. There is no reason why he should be permitted to legislate an increased salary to himself without any knowledge on the part of the Congress.

Why, I understand that Mr. Brown not long ago, in the hearings before this committee, made the statement that I was interested in a scheme for the adjustment of a soldier's allotment and that the person to whom the allotment was made was morally unworthy. I assume that he meant to convey in his statement the idea that I was doing a thing that I had no right to do. Now, I wish to submit to the House this statement, that every letter that comes to me, either from the wife or the mother or the relative of a soldier who has made an allotment, is taken up by me on the statement made in the letter, and I submit the case to the bureau for adjustment on the assumption that the bureau will make the necessary investigation and act in accordance with the law and the facts. I have no interest in anybody's claim except to see that the claim is properly adjudicated according to the facts and the law and the obligations of the Government, and I think it is a piece of impertinence on the part of Mr. Brown to come before one of the committees of the House, sitting in executive session, and make a statement such as I understand he made about me in connection with this case, about the merits of which I have no knowledge whatever, and then not have the courage to let the statement stand in the record. After he made it and it went into the stenographic record he struck it out, because he did not dare to let the statement stand.

I am unable to say just exactly what Mr. Brown said, but whatever he said it proved that he was impertinent and that he was going beyond all bounds of reason and decency.

Now, why did he make the statement? He said he made the statement because I had criticized the bureau. Am I to be subjected to innuendo, or is any other Member of this House to be subjected to innuendo, by a subordinate employee of the Government because we stand on the floor of the House and defend the rights of those whose sons fought to defend the flag? Are we to be criticized because we insist that efficiency shall be the standard by which we gauge the operations of the various executive departments?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Are we to be subjected to criticism by men who are on the pay roll and have proved their own unworthiness by failure to perform the functions of the office to which they have been appointed simply because we criticize their inefficiency?

I submit that Mr. Brown, or any other employee of the Government, ought not to be permitted to do that, and I also wish to say in this connection right here that when Mr. Brown was before the Committee on Appropriations and made the statement he exceeded every sense of decency and propriety.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. The committee itself should have done me the courtesy to send for me and let me be present when Mr. Brown was making the statement. He would not dare to make a statement about me in the open light of day. He would not dare to let the statement that he made in executive session stand. He would not dare to criticize my integrity of purpose. He would not dare to make the statement that I ever appealed to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, or to any other bureau, for anything that was not clean and decent and right and just and fair, and he only did it because he thought he was under cover of secrecy and that he would poison the mind of some member of the committee against me by saying what was not true.

I challenge Mr. Brown to make a statement in public that I ever, under any circumstances, either directly or indirectly—and I challenge anybody else not only in connection with the Government, but any man in America, to make the statement—that I have ever been identified with anything that was not clean and decent and right, and I resent not only the impudence but the arrogance of these men who are employed by the Government and who come here to plead for additional appropriations in order that they may increase their own salaries, criticizing Members of this House because they insist that the business of the Government and the allotments to widows of dead soldiers or the wives of wounded soldiers or soldiers who are still alive and not wounded are not given the attention which they ought to be given.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know whether I correctly understand just what statement was made by Mr. Brown that the gentleman has alluded to.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know exactly what statement was made myself, except that Mr. Brown said I was interested in the case of an allotment made by a soldier to a woman about whose moral character there was some doubt, and that the address given by the soldier was said to be in a house about the moral standing of which there was at least grave doubt. I am not supposed to know where people live. I am not supposed to know whether they are of good moral character or not. I only know that a man is a soldier when he has enlisted in the Army. I only know that he is defending the American flag, and I only know that when he has taken the oath of allegiance to the flag and shoulders a rifle he is entitled to the same consideration as any other soldier; and if there is anything wrong with his character or with the character of those with whom he associates, that is not my business.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Where was this statement made?

Mr. MADDEN. In the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it in the hearings?

Mr. MADDEN. No; Mr. Brown did not dare leave it in the hearings. He made the statement, it went into the stenographic record, and when the record was given to Mr. Brown for correction he struck it out.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It seems to me that is a very remarkable thing for a bureau chief to say of a Member of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is an outrage.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In what way did he claim the gentleman was interested?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know the language he used.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to assure the gentleman—I think my recollection is perfectly clear about the matter—that Mr. Brown did not in his language reflect upon the gentleman in any way with reference to the case to which he refers, and there was not the slightest intimation that there was anything of the kind in his mind or that the gentleman knew anything about the character of the person to whom he referred.

Mr. MADDEN. Did Mr. Brown know anything about the character of the person?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The only statement he made was based upon the report of the investigators who had charge of the case.

Mr. MADDEN. I know; but why should Mr. Brown undertake to criticize me?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want again to assure the gentleman that there was not the slightest criticism of him.

Mr. MADDEN. Did not Mr. Brown say that he raised the question in this case because I had criticized the Bureau of War Risk Insurance?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My recollection is that the matter came up in connection with the hearing of Mr. Brown in relation to the investigations made by the bureau as to these allotments and allowances, and he was proceeding to point out the necessity of such investigation and the wisdom of the law which required it. He made the statement that practically all of these allowances and allotments were made upon requests by the soldiers, and involved no fraud or intention to defraud, but that there were cases that had come to the attention of the bureau where there was a plain intention to defraud. I remember, for instance, that he referred to some case—I can not give the name because I do not remember it——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In one case a woman was drawing a double allotment and allowance on the plea that she was the wife of two different soldiers. Now, in connection with the gentleman's statement, I do recall that Mr. Brown referred to some case in Chicago in which a soldier had made a request for an allowance to supplement the allotment he had made in behalf of his wife, and the investigation disclosed that the address given by the soldier was a place of questionable repute; but Mr. Brown stated, according to my recollection, that the woman involved claimed that she did not live there, and they had no direct proof that she did, although the investigator reported that the address given was a place of that character; but I want again to assure the gentleman that not in the slightest degree did Mr. Brown reflect upon the gentleman from Illinois or intimate in any way that the gentleman had any knowledge of the facts, or had done more than call the attention of the bureau to the case.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee why should Mr. Brown call the attention of the committee to me in the case?

Mr. SWITZER. That is the point. Why was the gentleman's name brought into it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The case happened to be mentioned among a number that Mr. Brown was calling attention to in order to show the necessity or importance of this investigation being made in order to strike from the list those cases where allowance checks were being sent out improperly. This case happened to be among others that he referred to.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose that the neighborhood in which this woman was supposed to have lived was not a respectable neighborhood. Does that mean that the woman herself may not be respectable? Does that mean that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is going to decide about the respectability of the neighborhood in which a soldier's wife lives before they decide in favor of granting the allotment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I said, Mr. Brown stated that the investigation simply showed that the address given by the soldier as the residence of his wife was a house of bad reputation, but that she claimed not to live there, and that they had no direct proof that she did live there, and I assume that the allowance is being paid now; but I submit to the gentleman that if a woman is living in a house of notorious repute——

Mr. MADDEN. I agree——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That undoubtedly the allowance should not be paid.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the point I wish to make in connection with this is that Mr. Brown himself, as I understand it, said that he raised the question of my interest in the case, because I had had the courage to criticize the efficiency of the War Risk Bureau. If that is going to be the attitude of the War Risk Bureau, we will find out about it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Brown is not connected with the War Risk Bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. He is the man who is working out the efficiency system of the War Risk Bureau, and if Mr. Brown is going to assume that attitude we will find out about Mr. Brown and about the War Risk Bureau. For one, I do not propose to permit Mr. Brown to criticize Members of the Congress of the United States when they call attention to cases that have not been settled, which ought to be settled. Mr. Brown is not going to be permitted to get away with that. We will call him before a committee and he will be compelled to tell what he knows in public, and we will make him tell it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I was not in the Hall at the time the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] made some observations a while ago expressing very proper impatience at the tardy completion of the Grant Monument. I myself have been puzzled by that, and I have investigated it from time to time since I have had anything to do with the Committee on the Library. I want to explain to the gentleman before I refer to the chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts, with whom I spoke about two days ago about this matter, that the Grant Monument was authorized before the Commission of Fine Arts was established. The artist who was doing the work—and he is doing a beautiful work, I think, and it will be a great ornament to the city—like nearly all artists with whom we have had dealings, took his own time in which to do his work. Probably that gives us better results. It is said that it does. They say so, and gentlemen who are more familiar with art and art's excellence than I am say so. We had a similar experience in the case of this beautiful pediment over the east wing of the Capitol. Mr. Bartlett, the artist, has done a great work, but he paid no attention, I may say, to the limitations of the statute as to time. I asked Mr. Moore, the chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts, two days ago what was the prospect for the early completion of the Grant Monument. He said it looked brighter; that now we could get what we have not been able to get for the last four years—the essential material for its completion.

Mr. SLOAN. It is the artist's invariable defense that art is long and time is fleeting?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; I think so. I wanted to say this much because some gentlemen seem to think that the Fine Arts Commission controls that, or that the Committee on the Library has something more to do with it than they have. The delays, under the circumstances, were inevitable. The delay in the procurement of the material was due entirely to the war.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of line 5, page 30, including the word "that" and all of lines 6 and 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RUCKER: Page 30, line 5, after the word "Provided," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge a question. I note this paragraph appropriates $125,000 in a lump sum for the administrative work of the Bureau of——

A MEMBER. Efficiency.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; Efficiency. I could not think of the word—we have had so little of it. What particular reason governed the committee in making a lump-sum appropriation in this case rather than appropriating for the officers and clerks in the usual way?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There never has been any other appropriation than a lump-sum appropriation for this bureau. It was a lump-sum appropriation when it was under the Civil Service Commission, and it was a lump-sum appropriation for this reason: The gentleman will appreciate the fact that when the Bureau of Efficiency is called on to investigate a particular bureau of the Government, it may need more help at one time than at another, and the appropriation necessarily had to be flexible, so that they can employ the needed number of accountants and experts when they need them, and when they do not need them they can dispense with them.

Mr. RUCKER. I concede that if there is use for the Bureau of Efficiency at all the gentleman's reply is a complete answer to my inquiry, but let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee another question. Was not an effort made a year ago, when this or a like bill was under consideration, to fix a specific salary for the chairman or the chief of this bureau at a certain sum?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There was a recommendation on the part of the committee that the salary of the chief of the bureau be made $5,000 a year. That was contained in the legislative bill, which was reported to the House at the last session. The gentleman will doubtless recall that that provision went out on a point of order.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman advise the committee what salary is received by Mr. Brown?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He is now being paid the sum of $6,000. The gentleman knows that this bureau has been placed especially under the President. Of course, Mr. Brown has no authority to fix his salary.

Mr. RUCKER. Who did fix his salary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Or the salary of any other employee of the bureau. The President fixed the salary at $6,000, and he is now drawing that sum.

Mr. RUCKER. That is one instance in which I heartily and cordially disagree with the President. I am not disturbed about the question which agitated my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I do not think Mr. Brown could injure me very much in my district.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not talking about my district. I am talking about Mr. Brown's impudence.

Mr. RUCKER. If Mr. Brown should refer to my espousing the cause of some person who was of immoral character, even though he did not give the sex of that person, it would make no difference, for I am like Cæsar's wife—above suspicion. Impudence? Unquestionably it is impudent in the extreme—intolerable impudence, for any man to question the integrity of the acts of any Member of Congress in presenting to this House or to the bureau having these matters in charge any question involving the interests of any constituent.

Mr. Chairman, I made a motion to strike out this language with a view of following it with a motion to insert other language. I believe this House, after the experience which we have had, ought to legislate ourselves——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has moved to strike out the language that the committee has inserted in this paragraph, which is the only limitation——

Mr. RUCKER. I want to put another limitation on it, though.

Mr. BRYNS of Tennessee. And the gentleman may make the mistake which was made a year ago, when the salary went out on the point of order. The amendment that the gentleman proposes to offer may not be adopted, and then we will have no limitation whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask that my time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me ask the gentleman, would this language make the amendment subject to a point of order:

Provided, That no person employed hereunder shall receive a salary in excess of $5,000, and not more than nine persons at a rate of compensation in excess of $3,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. RUCKER. Suppose the language in the bill was stricken out and this language inserted:

Provided, That no person employed hereunder shall receive a salary in excess of $5,000, and not more than nine persons at a rate of compensation in excess of $3,000.

Why would not that be a pretty good thing to do and a proper and fair limitation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, the gentleman is asking me as to the merits of the proposition.

Mr. RUCKER. I am trying to get the gentleman committed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say I do not think that would be a good thing to do, for this reason: The Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency is now receiving $6,000 a year——

Mr. RUCKER. And, according to the universal testimony of every Member who has thus far expressed himself, is $6,000 more than he is earning.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, without arguing that point that the gentleman makes, I think there can be a great deal said about the great service rendered by the Bureau of Efficiency in several particulars, as testified to by Internal Revenue Commissioner Roper, and I know the gentleman has the utmost confidence in Mr. Roper.

Mr. RUCKER. Absolutely so—no better or more efficient man in the public service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He stated to the committee—and the gentleman will find it in the hearings—that Mr. Brown and his Efficiency Bureau have been of the greatest service to him in the organization of his bureau, and I can cite the gentleman to the Postmaster General——

Mr. RUCKER. I have no doubt that under the direction and with the skillful and intellectual management of Mr. Roper even Mr. Brown could improve old conditions in the Treasury Department, but we need Roper to make Brown efficient.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But waiving the efficiency of the Efficiency Bureau for a moment I do not think we ought to undertake to reduce his salary from $6,000 to $5,000 in this bill for this reason: Congress left the matter open in the last bill. Mr. Brown had no authority to fix his own salary, and I assume if he had such authority he would not have exercised it, because it was a rather delicate thing to do, but my opinion is—there can be no doubt about it—that the matter was presented to the President of the United States, and after such consideration as he thought necessary the salary of the Chief of Bureau of Efficiency was fixed at $6,000. Now, I do not think we ought to legislate here on the question of a salary as to what we may think of a particular individual filling that place. The salary ought to be fixed for the position, and if a man who holds the position now is not entitled to it or is not the proper man some one else ought to take the place.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman says we ought not to legislate on the question of a salary here. Where ought we to legislate upon it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I qualified my statement by saying I did not think we ought to legislate upon the question of salary in this bill with sole reference to the individual to whom it is to be paid.

Mr. RUCKER. I concede that. Let me ask the gentleman. When you wrote in this bill the proviso "that not more than nine persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $3,000 per annum" that means nine persons will draw not less than $3,000, and it also means that some of the nine will draw whatever sum they may see fit to place it at. I do not believe this Congress can escape responsibility in that way, I believe the gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee, with all the facilities they have for ascertaining the reasonable value of this service, ought to bring to the House a concrete proposition fixing the salary.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will agree in this——

Mr. RUCKER. One moment. Under this law there is nothing to prevent somebody from fixing Mr. Brown's salary at $25,000. We ought to fix it in the bill. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman refers to nine persons who may receive more than $3,000. I am quite sure the gentleman will agree that if this bureau performs the service which it is expected to perform that they will need a number of good men and expert accountants. Now, the gentleman knows you can not get an expert accountant for less than $3,000 and——

Mr. RUCKER. If they need an expert accountant in the Bureau of Efficiency, who is going to select him? Mr. Brown can not do it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Brown chooses the employees.

Mr. RUCKER. I know; but I say he is not competent to choose an efficient man, if what we hear is true.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, the gentleman goes back to the question of the merits or the demerits of the chief of the bureau.

Mr. RUCKER. That is what we are dealing with.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is a question I think the gentleman ought to take up with the President, who appoints him, because he agrees it is no attack upon the committee.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman knows the President could not consider the matter, and ought not to do so, but that Congress ought to fix the salary.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The President is responsible for the fact that Mr. Brown holds that position, and the President has fixed his salary at $6,000 a year.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not know about that. The gentleman is making a statement which, it seems to me, is in the nature of an accusation. I do not know about it. I do not know whether the President is responsible for it or not, but I can not think he is.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the motion I made, and now move to strike out the language read by the Clerk and insert——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to add to that amendment. It is the same thing. Strike out the language after the word "Provided" to the end of the paragraph and insert:

That no person employed hereunder shall receive a salary in excess of $5,000 and not more than nine persons at a rate of compensation in excess of $3,000 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RUCKER moves, on page 30, line 5, after the word "Provided," to strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That no person employed hereunder shall receive a salary in excess of $5,000 and not more than nine persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $3,000 per annum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The only effect that amendment would have, if adopted, would be to reduce the salary of the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency. He is now getting, as has been stated on the floor, $6,000. That salary has been fixed by the President, under whom this bureau has been directly placed. Now, I submit to these gentlemen who differ with me as to the merits of the services of Mr. Brown that we ought not in this bill to determine upon the salary or to measure a salary by the personality of the individual who holds that particular position. If Mr. Brown is not the proper man to be the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency, he ought to be removed, undoubtedly, and the President has authority to remove him. And I am sure the President would give the fullest consideration to any gentleman, either on the floor or off the floor, who presented to him facts showing whether or not Mr. Brown was the proper man to be at the head of the bureau. But we ought to fix this salary, gentlemen, in accordance with the importance of the position and without reference to the individual who holds that position.

Now, he is getting $6,000. I think this Government can well afford to pay a man at the head of the Bureau of Efficiency $6,000 if he is capable and competent to perform the duties of that position, because there is no position where a man can render greater service to this Government than in connection with that bureau.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. When did the President appoint Mr. Brown?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. About three or four years ago.

Mr. RUCKER. About two or three years ago?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Three or four years ago. I do not know just when.

Mr. RUCKER. At the last session of this Congress the gentleman himself brought in a bill here providing for a $5,000 salary for Mr. Brown, and the President fixed his salary. Let me ask the gentleman another thing. What salary does Gen. Roper, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, get?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Sixty-five hundred dollars; but the revenue bill contains a provision which will raise his salary to $10,000.

Mr. RUCKER. What are the chiefs of bureaus usually paid? Is it less than $6,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Some of them get less than $6,000.

Mr. RUCKER. Are there any that get as much as $6,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Director of the Bureau of Standards——

Mr. RUCKER. But that is purely scientific work.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (continuing). And the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. RUCKER. But a great many get less than $6,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A number get less than $6,000.

Mr. RUCKER. A year ago the gentleman thought that $5,000 was salary enough for the chief of this bureau. I think he was right then.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, how long has Mr. Brown been in the service of this Efficiency Commission?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Ever since it was established. I do not recall just the year.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. He was first appointed by President Taft, was he not, as a member of the commission?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. He was appointed under the Civil Service Commission. This bureau was a division of the Civil Service Commission up until two or three years ago, and at that time Congress took it from the Civil Service Commission and placed it directly under the President.

Now, the gentleman from Missouri refers to the fact that the committee brought in a report a year ago fixing this salary at $5,000. That is true. But the estimate submitted to the committee was for $6,000. The committee determined to report $5,000. That went out upon a point of order. Then it became necessary for some one to fix Mr. Brown's salary, and since that time Mr. Brown has been drawing $6,000 by virtue of the action of the President.

Now, I want to repeat what I said, if the gentleman will permit me. The Bureau of Efficiency, as I could show if I had the time, has rendered material service, and I wish gentlemen here who have criticized the Bureau of Efficiency would take the time to investigate just what that bureau has done, and I wish they would confer with heads of the various bureaus and departments with which it has been connected for the past two or three years. Mr. Roper——

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have made an investigation of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, I will say to the gentleman, inasmuch as I was very much interested in the administration of the law creating that bureau; and I went down to see Mr. Delanoy when I was there and tried to find out from him what was the matter, and I was spoken to by several people in the bureau about Mr. Brown's efficiency in that bureau. There are about 15 division chiefs in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and I went around to quite a number of them and told them that I was making an investigation there to see if I could find out what was the matter with the business of the bureau, why it was not carried on up to date, why letters were not answered, and why there seemed to be a lack of efficiency in the bureau. I told them that I had come there to see what they thought about it, in the light of their experience. They were experienced people. A great many of them came here and volunteered their services during the war. There are people down there getting $2,500 and $3,000 that in other business can command a much higher salary. In the case of every man who was the chief of a division in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance that I asked what the trouble was, the first word was "Brown!"

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to make a statement right there?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more? I want to reply first to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Then let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say, in response to the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] that it is one of the best evidences, to my mind, that Mr. Brown has been trying to do his duty. I recall what Gen. Bragg said about President Cleveland on one occasion, that he loved him because of the enemies he had made; and the very fact that chiefs of division are criticizing Mr. Brown is an evidence, to my mind, that he has been trying to accomplish something, even though he may have failed.

Now, in spite of that—in spite of what the chiefs of division have said concerning Mr. Brown—it is a notable fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has continued the services of his bureau down there as an aid to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, no.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And even recently, when Assistant Secretary Love resigned and the bureau was placed in the charge of Assistant Secretary Rowe, I am informed that Assistant Secretary Rowe wrote a letter to Mr. Brown requesting him to continue the service of his bureau in connection with the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Now, I say, in spite of what some chief of division has said in criticism of Mr. Brown, the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary immediately in charge of that bureau has continued his services there is, to my mind, a sufficient answer. It is not particularly surprising that there may be some chief of division who criticizes Mr. Brown, and I dare say you might find some in other departments where the Bureau of Efficiency has been undertaking to perform service. I have no doubt that there may be some chief of division who possibly has not had some recommendation of his put into effect who has criticized Mr. Brown and the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Very well. That criticism is probably well taken; but the fact remains that during the administration of Mr. Brown we could not get an answer to a letter for weeks. That has been my experience.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it that has been the condition in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance ever since it was organized.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. When did Mr. Brown go in there to take charge of it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He never did take charge of it until Mr. Delanoy resigned.

Mr. IGOE. I understand he has been in charge of it for a year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. At the time that Mr. Delanoy resigned, Mr. Love, the Assistant Secretary, who had had charge of the bureau since its organization and who knew what Mr. Brown and the Bureau of Efficiency had done in the War Risk Bureau, requested Mr. Brown to serve as acting director pending the appointment of a permanent director.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me say to the gentleman that during the time that Mr. Brown was in the War Risk Insurance Bureau, in authority, as I have information which I think is reliable, an order was issued called "I. C. 145." Has the gentleman ever seen it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not recall it.

Mr. RUCKER. And that order circulated among all the clerks and stenographers of that bureau, expressly on its face saying—and I want the gentleman to listen—that order expressly directing that no letter shall be answered in relation to checks for allowances or allotments. It said: "File them. If a second letter comes, answer that in a formal way."

Now, is that efficiency? That kind of efficiency that we have had there led to the fact—and I state this on my personal responsibility—led to the fact that a letter written to me, dated December 3, was mailed under the efficiency of that bureau on December 17 at 5.30 p. m. and reached me the next morning.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not want to get into a discussion of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance on this item, because it will be discussed when we reach the item for that bureau.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman sort of reprehends the clerks.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. RUCKER. Then I withdraw that remark.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph or anything else in order to get recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the motion. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] have 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to cut off anybody from discussing this bill, but we want to get through with this bill, if possible, to-night, and certainly to-morrow. We have an amendment pending here now which relates to the salaries of the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency and nine others. I do not think we ought to drift off on a discussion of the War Risk Bureau, when, as a matter of fact, that subject will come up later on, with reference to the appropriation made for that bureau.

Mr. RAYBURN. Probably I would not have wanted recognition now if the gentleman had not been quite so vigorous in replying to me.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman started that by stating what a chief of division had said to him.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and I am going to reply——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I feel that gentlemen ought to confine themselves to the amendment. I promised, gentlemen, that I would insist on that, and I do not think we ought to take an hour now on the War Risk Insurance Bureau and then take up the subject again later on when we come to discuss the appropriation for it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I want to speak about Mr. Brown. He has been up for discussion here.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I stated here a moment ago that after the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was organized I realized that they had a great big job, the biggest job in the Government, and for several months I felt that they ought to be entirely excused for not answering letters, as they had a great organization to carry on there. Finally, after the bureau had been in operation about 10 months, I had heard a great many things said here on the floor of the House that I thought probably were not justified; and I still think a great deal of the criticism that has been made of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the administration of the law has been made out of a misunderstanding of the law. But I went down to see the director, Mr. Delanoy, and asked him what was the matter. I said, "Have you got plenty of clerks down here?" He said, "We have got all the clerks that we need." Mr. Brown was present at that time. I said, "Then what is the matter with this bureau?" Mr. Delanoy did not say anything, but Mr. Brown said, "Just give us a little more time, and we are going to pull this bureau through." I went on with my investigation a little, and I found out that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, Mr. Delanoy, was having nothing whatever to do with the direction of the bureau, but that it had been turned over practically bodily to Mr. Herbert Brown.

Mr. IGOE. When did Mr. Brown first go into the bureau?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think Mr. Brown has been in the bureau since last spring; I am not sure just how long.

Mr. IGOE. Was he not there in December, a year ago?

Mr. RAYBURN. He probably was.

Mr. IGOE. He certainly was.

Mr. RAYBURN. I found out also that a board of control or a consulting board had been formed with reference to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, composed of men who met once or twice a week to consult about reforms in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance; and I found out that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was not on that board at all. I found out by further investigation that all promotions or demotions and all appointments went not through the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance but through Mr. Brown. I found out that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance had been absolutely stripped of all the authority that he should have had under the act.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman tell us who was responsible for that?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am going to do it if I have the time, because I have a story that I want to tell. As I say, I found out that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance had been stripped of all the authority that he ever had or that he should have had. I called him and his main assistant together when Mr. Brown went out and said to them, "The Bureau of War Risk Insurance ought to be run from the inside and not from the outside. If you are big enough to run this bureau, you will either run it or resign." Mr. Delanoy resigned, and I fully believe that if he had been given a fair chance he would have pulled this bureau through. As I said a moment ago, I saw that the morale of the bureau was gone. The section chiefs did not know what to do. They did not know their right hands from their left hands. I went among them, several of them, and asked what was the matter—what had destroyed the morale of the bureau? They said they had suggestions to make, but they did not know to whom to make them; and they said that the director seemed to think he did not feel disposed to take up these matters. Now, these men are not job hunters. They are people who have come here—actuaries of great insurance companies, insurance men from all over the country who have been drawing great big salaries in the employ of private companies—men who have come here desirous of doing their best work for the Government, and practically every one of them is wanting to resign, and many of them are being begged to retain their positions. Every one of whom I consulted gave me the same answer, that Brown had disorganized this bureau from top to bottom.

I went to the then Acting Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Love, from my own State, and told him what I thought was the matter with this bureau. I said to him, "Mr. Brown may be the best efficiency man in the country, and all that, but I never knew the time when a good efficiency man was necessarily a good executive, and I think that to put Mr. Brown in any kind of executive authority in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was a tremendous mistake and a tremendous blunder."

The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury did not agree with me. He said that Mr. Brown had made a great reputation here as an efficiency man, and that he was going to pull that bureau through if given time.

Now, this is the sequel of that thing: Mr. Delanoy resigned. Mr. Brown stayed in there, but instead of conditions getting better under Mr. Brown's administration they got worse.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. DYER. Ten minutes were allowed for debate on this amendment and the gentleman has used only five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] asked me to yield to him the other five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on this was fixed at 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that we extend the time to 20 minutes instead of 10 minutes. I think this is important.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am very anxious to complete this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Texas is discussing the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. He is discussing Mr. Brown.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will defer his remarks until we reach that item, because I am sure he will want to discuss it then.

Mr. RAYBURN. I hope the gentleman will let me have five minutes more. I am right in the middle of the statement that I was making.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will want to discuss the War Risk Bureau when we reach it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I hope to God the time is coming when there will be no excuse for discussing it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's continuing for five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. That is to be added to the time heretofore granted.

The CHAIRMAN. To be added to the time heretofore granted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, at that, as I said, Mr. Delanoy had resigned. After I had this talk with the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and after he expressed his great appreciation of the work of Mr. Brown, Mr. Delanoy had resigned. Mr. Brown went on, not only in the capacity he was in, but he was appointed director pro tempore of the bureau. Conditions, as I say, did not get better, but they got worse every day. I do not blame Mr. Brown for going into the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. It was the greatest bureau of the Government, and if he could have pulled it through, it would probably have added greatly to his reputation, but, as I say, it got worse every day instead of better, until the condition, I am willing to admit, became most exasperating to anybody who had anything to do with the bureau. When the question of the appointment of another director came up, Col. Lindsley, who was in Europe and who had charge of this matter over there, and who had carried it on well, as he has carried on everything else that he has been connected with—and he is also a citizen of Dallas—was asked by Mr. McAdoo to come here and take charge of this bureau and pull it through. Col. Lindsley came to see me to my room in my hotel and told me that he had been offered this thing and that he was considering taking it. I said to him that there was a great opportunity in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. I told him that there was great opportunity for him to destroy the credit that he had gained in Europe, that there was a great chance for him to destroy all of the credit that he had ever gotten, justly, by putting over big organization heretofore, but there was also great opportunity for great service. I said to him, as I told the last Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance ought to be run from the inside and not from the outside, and that if a man is not big enough as director of that bureau to run it, he ought to be discharged and some one put in his place. I then went on to detail to him what I thought was the matter, and went over the same conversation with him that I had had with the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. He said that was most remarkable, for he had just had a talk with Mr. Brown that day, and he told me that Mr. Brown agreed at that time with the suggestions that I detailed that I had made to Mr. Love, that he ought never to have been put in an executive capacity in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and that he had been put in a false attitude—indicating thereby that he would like to be relieved of that; but not to my knowledge, before he made this great failure to put the bureau over, had he ever asked that any of the authority that has been placed in his hands be taken away.

I want to say this further. I believe the members of the committee before whom he has appeared will bear me out in this, that there is now in charge of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance a man who will pull that bureau through and bring it up to the high standard of efficiency it ought to have if he is let alone and is allowed to run that bureau from the inside instead of having it heckled from the outside. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to say to the gentleman that I think I can note a great improvement in it already since Mr. Lindsley has taken charge.

Mr. McFADDEN. I understood that Mr. Brown is accountable now to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. Is he accountable to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury or to Col. Lindsley?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know about that. Col. Lindsley, I think, has the correct idea. If he is in need of an efficiency man, if he thinks that some section of his bureau is not operating correctly and that the services of Mr. Brown in an advisory capacity might be of some value in making recommendations, he will employ him in that capacity.

Mr. McFADDEN. The reason I asked that is to ascertain whether there is still a divided authority or whether Col. Lindsley has complete authority.

Mr. RAYBURN. Col. Lindsley, I think, stated before the Committee on Rules the other day that he was entirely responsible.

Mr. McFADDEN. Some gentleman to-day said in debate that this efficiency expert was accountable to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury as well.

Mr. RAYBURN. The head of the Bureau of Efficiency is no longer the head of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What I said was that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was one of those bureaus in the Treasury Department which is under an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. Of course, Col. Lindsley is responsible for the bureau, but each Assistant Secretary of the Treasury is assigned certain bureaus of the department and has general supervision of them all.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know enough about Col. Lindsley to know that when they take authority away from him he will quit the job.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief for Mr. Brown. I do not approve of a great many things that have been done in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. No one will claim that bureau was ever efficient, but that is not the question before us. I was not present in the committee room when the subcommittee had this matter under consideration and the occurrence took place about which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] spoke this morning. I never heard of it until the gentleman referred to it this morning, but if Mr. Brown was guilty of some indiscretion in that regard, let us at least give him credit for having sense enough to strike it from his remarks and not have it printed, because I do not defend anyone—I do not care in what department he may be—who will come before one of the legislative branches and reflect upon the work of a Member of the House or the Senate. That is not within the province of any such official. Brown did the proper thing in striking such reference from his remarks. I do know that this bureau, operating under the President, has really accomplished some very good work. I do not know whether Mr. Brown is the man to be at the head of it or not. I have a high opinion of his ability, and I do know that you can not have a really efficient man who can go to officers as high as Secretaries and tell them how they must do things, how their offices should be efficiently conducted, unless you pay him a good salary.

The President fixed that salary of Mr. Brown. Congress refused to fix it, and the President, I suppose, fixed the salary only high enough to get a man whom he thought was big enough and able enough to conduct this work, and when I heard Mr. Roper, of the Internal Revenue Department, say that Mr. Brown had rendered wonderful assistance to him and his department I came to the conclusion that the President had made no mistake either in the selection of the man or the amount of his salary, for it really means something to win approval from a man like that, as efficient as Mr. Roper is.

Mr. MADDEN. Was not Brown in the service before the President became President?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Brown, as you know, worked here under Mr. Tawney when he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He had him investigating the question of insurance, and he made a report that was adopted by the House, and he has been doing the same character of efficiency work for a number of years for various departments of the Government. I have no doubt if he went out into private life he could get much more than $6,000 a year as an accountant, for he is an expert accountant of high standing.

Mr. MADDEN. He may be an expert accountant and not worth a cent as an efficiency man.

Mr. GOOD. I do not know about that. I do know that Mr. Brown and his Bureau of Efficiency went in the office of the Treasury and he sent to the reading room five or six men who were receiving salaries as high as $3,000 a year and none lower than $2,500; he sent them to the reading room; while he went into the office of the Treasury, where they had not been able for more than six months to strike a balance nearer than a million dollars, and effected there a degree of efficiency so that the next year the work in the office was brought up to date, and the next year the department dropped enough clerks so as to effect a saving of $100,000 in that department alone. That is the fact. Now, gentlemen, you talk about some of these war-risk matters and get all "het" up about it and charge all delays to Mr. Brown, but I want to say you can, acting upon these prejudiced claims, do a great injustice to the Government. Whenever a Government official or any branch of the Government is trying to work out efficiency we ought to help. I remember when Mr. Brown opposed the matter of transfer in the question of allotments to the Quartermaster General. Mr. Brown said to the War Department at that time that the proposed change would create confusion in the Department of War Risk Insurance and work a great hardship, both to the enlisted man and his dependents. He stood firm in the matter, and he fought it through, but he could not prevent the rule being adopted that the War Department wanted so that the Quartermaster General should make these allotments after the 1st of July. Now, Mr. Brown is accused of all the faults which resulted from this change, and which were clearly not through Mr. Brown's operation of the law, but in spite of all he could do in preventing this change.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Has the gentleman ever been able to find out who is responsible for the cutting off or the transfer of these allotments—has the gentleman ever been able to find that out?

Mr. GOOD. The War Department ordered that. There is absolutely no question about that.

Mr. IGOE. The War Department says the War Risk Insurance Bureau and they say the War Department, and I would like to find out who really did.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is in error, and if he will investigate he will find out that Mr. Brown at the time opposed it, and really went out of his way in opposing it when he was not director, and told the War Department just what would result if it did that thing.

Mr. MADDEN. He generally goes out of his way to do things.

Mr. IGOE. Gen. Lord says not, and I would like to know who really did it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The War Risk Insurance Bureau had no power to transfer?

Mr. GOOD. Not at all. I am sure the War Department will never claim that it did not demand this change.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again reported?

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. RUCKER) there were—ayes 18, noes 41.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] A hundred and five gentlemen are present, a quorum.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Three commissioners, at $5,000 each; chief examiner, $3,500; secretary, $2,500; assistant chief examiner, $2,400; chiefs of divisions—one $2,400 (who shall act as assistant secretary), two at $2,000 each; certification clerk, $2,000; examiners—one $2,400, three at $2,000 each; six at $1,800 each; clerks—6 of class 4, 28 of class 3, 39 of class 2, 52 of class 1, 34 at $1,000 each, 22 at $900 each; messenger; assistant messenger; skilled laborer, $720; four messenger boys, at $420 each. Custodian force: Engineer, $840; general mechanic, $840; telephone-switchboard operator; two firemen; two watchmen; two elevator conductors, at $720 each; three laborers; four charwomen; in all, $291,020.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In what particular?

Mr. DYER. The gentleman proposes to increase the salaries of officials.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To what official does the gentleman refer?

Mr. DYER. To the commissioners, but there are several increases here.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will make his point of order to the particular portion of the paragraph to which it is addressed——

Mr. DYER. The whole paragraph is subject to the point of order. I reserve the point of order on the whole paragraph. Mr. Chairman, I do that for the purpose of calling to the attention of the committee that before we increase the salaries of members of the Civil Service Commission the House ought to know whether or not we are going to have some functioning on the part of the Civil Service Commission. Now, you gentlemen of the committee will agree that when we passed laws calling to the colors the men who are working in the departments, as well as other places in this country, that it was the understanding that if men gave up their positions and joined the Army or the Navy and did not claim exemption, as hundreds and thousands of them did here in the departments, that when those men returned from the Army with their honorable discharges they should be reinstated in their positions. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is not being done. The Civil Service Commission positions are being filled to-day, and when those men return here and want to go back to the positions that they had to give up to go into the service they find women, they find thousands of girls brought here from all parts of the country, and men who have been put in their positions, men who claimed exemption from service, who have entered the Government service in civilian capacity, and are filling the positions to-day, so that the men who went out to do military service and are now returning with honorable discharges find that they can not get their positions back.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does that apply, does the gentleman think, to the Postal Department?

Mr. DYER. I inquired of the Civil Service Commission, and asked if that was the rule, if they had any policy of putting men back in their position in the civil service who had had to resign to go to military duty, and they told me they were not necessarily putting these men back; that they were not required to put them back.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will state that I had an instance in which a man in my district was appointed under the civil service 10 days ago to take a rural free-delivery route, and to-day I have notice that a soldier who held it before he went had returned and therefore this man was discharged and the soldier was reinstated by the rule in the Post Office Department. That is the reason I asked you about that. I also had a conference to-day with the head of the Southern Railway, which is a quasi Government department, and he said they were reinstating every soldier that came back, and the ladies who were in there to hold their places were going to be discharged.

Mr. DYER. That may be true with reference to railroads; it may be true with reference to the heads of some divisions or departments; but it is not so with reference to the War Department, and it is not so in reference to some other departments. We are being asked to appropriate in this very bill, to which the chairman will agree, for the reemployment and continuation of employment of hundreds of women in the Navy Department, yeowomen, reservists, and where they are receiving more pay than women who have been working there in the civil service for years. And in addition to that, gentlemen, we have men in the naval service, and who are working up there in the Navy Department, men brought here from all over the country and put in there because they are efficient, because they are accountants, because they understand the work in the Bureau of Navigation, and those men are receiving $30 a month pay, while these girls are receiving $140 a month pay. And we can not get these men discharged from the naval service in order to go back home and accept positions that will pay them twice and four times as much.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman that when soldiers return and want their old positions they ought to be restored to them. But certainly my friend does not insist that the Civil Service Commission is responsible for the failure of these soldiers to secure these positions. It is a matter that rests with the department heads. The Civil Service Commission simply acts in this way: A department sends a notice to the commission that there is a vacancy and asks for a certification. The Civil Service Commission, under the law, can do nothing but certify a list of eligibles.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman give me a frank answer as to whether or not he is willing to put into this bill legislation or a proviso to the effect that all soldiers returning with an honorable discharge and seeking their positions back in the Government service that they gave up shall be reinstated?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Personally I would be very much in favor of a proposition of that sort.

Mr. DYER. Would the gentleman make a point of order against that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I doubt that Congress, without any hearing, without consulting the heads of the departments, ought to put into law a provision of that sort, because I do not know just what effect it would have upon the service in the departments.

Mr. DYER. Does not the gentleman know——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know how many places there are.

Mr. DYER. Does not the gentleman know what effect it will have upon the country as it is now to have men returning from military service and seeking their positions in the Government service being informed there is no vacancy; that their positions have been filled, and with girls and men working there who never rendered military service of any kind? I have had that experience. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman aware that I introduced a bill as soon as we declared war covering this situation and that the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and is sleeping there? And the Committee on Civil Service Reform, of which I am ashamed to be a member, has never done anything.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman knows, and we all know, that the Committee on Military Affairs of this House is very inactive and negligent about such matters.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service is dead.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was it not stated soon after the beginning of the war that these men would be restored to their places when they returned?

Mr. DYER. That was stated, and it was stated the country over, and these men who went to service and gave up their positions expected that. I heard it right here on the floor of this House. We have had Members get up and criticize the department heads for asking for exemption for men. The men working in the Government service were pointed to as slackers because their names appeared in this list. A lot of them would not take advantage of it. They had families, some of them, but they did not claim exemption and went into the service. They are coming back, and they are finding their positions filled not only with slackers but with thousands of women brought here from all over the country and who will not leave. The department heads are keeping them in preference—these men slackers and these girls—in preference to reinstating the soldiers of our country. It is not right, gentlemen; it is not just; and the Democratic Party, in charge of the Government, ought to be ashamed of itself, and this committee ought to be ashamed of itself, if it will not put a provision in this bill compelling the officials to put these men back.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman made a broad statement when he said that the departments are filled with slackers. Does not the gentleman know that the departments when these appointments were being made declined to appoint a man within the draft age to any of these places and that thousands of men resigned when they were called in the draft? And does not the gentleman admit that in his present contention that they should be restored?

Mr. DYER. Yes; but they are there by the thousands. And the heads of the departments sent in lists, and they have been published in the RECORD, of men for whom they have asked exemption.

There are thousands and thousands of them in the Government departments. There is no dispute about it. It is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, published here in compliance with the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and which was passed unanimously.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, there were a number who were exempted under the law on the certification of one or two of the departments here.

Mr. DYER. One or two? Every department. There were thousands in every department, almost. Look at the War Department exemptions. Look at the exemptions in the Agricultural Department. Look at every one of them. Go and search the RECORD in reference to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. We got reports from each department.

Gentlemen, it is a shame and a burning disgrace, and if the Civil Service Commission is not helping us then I am opposed to increasing their pay. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] states that he introduced a bill that was bottled up in the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not claim any particular credit for myself upon this question, but if the gentleman will examine the RECORD he will find that when the selective draft law was passed I offered an amendment along that line, and it was voted down by the House, so that the gentleman from New York need not criticize the Committee on Military Affairs especially, but he can criticize the whole membership of the House.

Now, I do not agree wholly with my colleague from Missouri [Mr. DYER], but he has touched upon a question of vital importance to the country. These men, not only those employed by the Government but those employed by private individuals and corporations, had good positions, most of them, when they entered the military service. Is the Government going to deny those people the right to have their positions again when they come back from the war? And if the Government denies them that right how can you expect private citizens and corporations in the country to live up to their promises and obligations in the matter?

We have all taken pride in the service flags that we have seen throughout the country, indicating the number of employees who have gone into the service, and employers have been proud to see how patriotic their men were. They have indicated by gold stars the men who will never return. We can do nothing for them, perhaps, except to honor their memory and service and care for those who were dependent or who would have been dependent upon them. Why should not the employers, led by the Government of the United States, have a service flag showing 100 per cent in giving employment to men who are now returning from the war and giving them the positions they left? [Applause.] They are the men who are entitled to them.

Of all the reconstruction problems we have the most immediate, the most pressing, the one we are face to face with right now, is that of unemployment, particularly of the men who are returning from the front, who are returning from the camps, who were taken from their positions by the legislation of this Congress to uphold the cause of their country. Can not the Congress and can not the Government lead the way for the private employers of the country and reinstate the men in the positions that are rightfully theirs?

I have had an instance of a Government employee who returned and who was told that they would try to find a place for him. After considerable delay they did find it, but it was only after much urging. I hope that my colleague from Missouri, when his party comes into control of the House, will also take care of the boys who were employed by this House and who went to the front and who may return when his party is in power. I happen to have two of them who were brought here from Missouri. [Applause.] I am looking to the Republicans upon that proposition to also take care of these two brave boys who have gone from their employment directly under the House of Representatives to fight our battles on the other side, both of whom are still there. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is a serious question, and I hope that some committee of this House will write it into the law, as I believe it is now in the Postal Service, that men who left the Government service shall have their positions. I hope a movement will sweep over this country so that employers who proudly boasted of these men going to the front, and justly so, will just as proudly boast of the fact that they have given back to these men the positions they had before they went into the service. Let them have a service flag, with stars of a special color if you will, indicating that the men have now returned and have been reemployed.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IGOE. I do.

Mr. ROBBINS. I had a constituent who was employed in the copyright division of the Library of Congress. He went to the front. He had been getting in the Copyright Division $92.50 a month, and when he came back he was offered a position in the basement, making up large packages for shipment out, at $40 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] reserve his point of order?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. IGOE] comes from a large manufacturing section of the country. I would like to ask him if he knows of any particular case where a manufacturer refused to take back a returning soldier?

Mr. IGOE. Yes. I saw a letter from a firm, a big firm, too, saying "Your position is open for 10 days and not thereafter."

Mr. SNYDER. Do you think there is anything unjust in that?

Mr. IGOE. I do; because if they do not take that man back he will practically be punished.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman evidently did not get my question. What I wanted to know was whether any large manufacturer or industry in his community had refused to take a soldier back on the pay roll after he made application for it?

Mr. IGOE. I know that statements have been written and made orally that they can not get their positions back.

Mr. SNYDER. I do not know of any particular case myself.

Mr. IGOE. I know what they are doing out in my city. The Employment Service of the United States has made a special effort to find employment for the soldiers and sailors and marines. If these men could get back their positions it would not be necessary to do that. I am glad the Government is doing it, and I am for it. I hope it will continue to do good work.

Mr. SNYDER. I agree with the gentleman most heartily.

Mr. IGOE. But I think we should set an example and show the way to private employers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to ask the gentleman if he proposed or introduced a bill some time ago to give returning soldiers their positions, which is absolutely just and with which I am in entire sympathy?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Why not propose that as an amendment to this bill and let us do it now?

Mr. IGOE. It is not germane to this bill. It was germane to the draft bill, and the Members of this House should have set the example at that time. But they can do it at any time, and I hope it will be done.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The time to do it is now.

Mr. IGOE. We ought to do it on one of these bills.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. This Government should set the example.

Mr. IGOE. That is the point I am trying to make. I do not say that there are positions for all these people, for changes have been made in business institutions since these men went away; but the Government ought to set the example, and corporations and private employers ought to follow the Government and do their best to place these men back where they were.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. If they do not, we may well be ashamed of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNYDER. It is a fact that the manufacturing concerns of this country have set the pace already in every instance, so far as I know, of taking the men back who come and present themselves for the positions that they left. It is a further fact that many of the soldiers who have returned have not presented themselves and have not come when sent for to take their positions back.

Mr. IGOE. Not so very many of them have had a chance to present themselves.

Mr. SNYDER. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. IGOE. If conditions are such that it is necessary to open employment bureaus now, what will happen when the rest of them come?

Mr. SNYDER. The difficulty we find in the manufacturing district I represent is that these boys who left positions and went away are not satisfied to come back and take the positions that they left. Most of them have a different viewpoint. They want something better, and it is difficult in some cases to give them that.

Mr. IGOE. Some people propose to give them arid lands and swamp lands and all that, which is good as far as it goes, but I think they want positions; I think they would like to get back the positions that they had.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Government will be able to restore to their positions, or to good positions, all of the boys who come back from the war, and that private employers may be able to do the same thing; but, after all, these questions are practical. Here is a place in private employment. They must have somebody to fill the place. In many cases they could take the boy back now who is in the Army; but not being able to get him they are required to get somebody to fill the place now, and in many cases are required to assure the party who gets the place that he will be retained in the job. In spite of that, in spite of the fact that we are maintaining a very expensive bureau to seek employment, I have numerous statements from employers in Chicago and elsewhere asking that the War Department discharge some man who is of no use at all in the Army and let him come home and take a responsibe place, but when they try to reach the responsible officers of the Army they might as well talk to a stone wall. If I write to the department about it, I get a form letter back. I suppose they print them in batches. If they do not, they waste lots of valuable time printing them individually. If you write to the commander of the man, usually you do not even get a form letter back. In many cases the commanders of the boys refuse to accept the applications. They have issued an order that if a man is asking for a discharge in order to be employed he must furnish three affidavits. Well, that is not so easy for the boy to do, especially if he is located here and his employer is located on the Pacific coast.

The Adjutant General's office and the Chief of Staff are absolutely callous. Their hides are thick as a walrus's. They have no desire to let boys out to take employment. They do not care whether when the boys come out they starve or get employment. They are utterly inhumane. There is no disposition on the part of the chief army officers to accommodate the boys who are in the Army who have employment awaiting them now to let them out, and in many cases employment that will not wait forever. In the readjustment which is going on, with the Government contracts taken away, many employers throughout the land have to figure on starting up their old businesses in the old way, and they need the men, and to all these cases the Army turns a cold shoulder and a deaf ear. They do not care. What they care about is to have Gen. March made a general. I am not interested to have Gen. March made a general of the Army, but I am interested that he should feel some responsibility to let men receive a discharge who want to go home who are now doing nothing in camp, and not give a general order up here which is not obeyed by a captain or a lieutenant. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman withhold that for a minute?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me to make a few remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist on the point of order?

Mr. DYER. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not want to cut off gentlemen, but we ought to get on with this bill, and I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I should like a little time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. How much time?

Mr. DOWELL. Five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Could not the gentleman get along with three minutes, or take the time on the next paragraph?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want a minute on my amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to say a few words on the subject that is now being discussed.

Mr. GOOD. I should like one minute.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, let me call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] to the fact that we have in the employ of the Government about 650,000 civil-service employees and that the Civil Service Commission must rate and keep tab on all these persons. The president of the commission receives $4,500 and the other members $4,000. We have increased the salary of all the commissioners, making it uniform at $5,000 a year. The civil service commissioners of New York State receive a salary of $5,000 each, of New York City $6,000, and of the city of Chicago $5,000 each. It seemed to the committee that this great commission, having charge of the ratings of 650,000 Government employees, ought to have as much salary as the civil service commissions of these States. That was the reason we made the increase.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I had no idea of making any remarks upon this subject, but the speech that was made a moment ago causes me not only to say a few words, but to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, from some of the speeches here one would think that the War Department treated every effort of Congressmen to aid their constituents with contempt. I have had many hundred letters from people in my district with regard to their sons in the Army, and I have taken these letters up with the War Department in its different official bureaus. I want to say that I have never had anything but courteous treatment and prompt attention paid to my requests, and I have never failed to get an answer and to get a discharge when I pursued the plain policy directed by the officers here in the War Department and presented a case warranting the action requested.

Mr. ROBBINS. How do you get them? Tell us how.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman sign some of my letters?

Mr. HARDY. I do not know the men I write to; there is nothing mysterious about it. I write to the officials, and they tell me what to do. Any other gentleman in this House can go to the same authority that I do and he will get a courteous answer is my belief, and I have never failed to get a courteous answer. But I warn gentlemen that if they expect just simply to send to the department a request for the discharge of any man and have him discharged because they ask it, they will be disappointed.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Just yesterday a physician out here at Camp Humphreys asked to be discharged, stating that he was a physician in San Antonio. The commanding officer approved it. The application came to Washington, and amid the millions of papers it was not immediately taken charge of. He asked me to investigate this. I called up the proper officer and he said that he would look into the papers, and inside of three hours that man was ordered discharged. I have never failed to have courteous treatment. There is a good deal in the way you approach people. [Laughter on Republican side.] Yes; it is so with you. You let a man come to you in one manner and you will regard him, and another and you will ignore him.

Mr. FESS. Is that a policy to be followed by a Government official?

Mr. HARDY. I do not care who he is; he is a human being, and if you write an insolent letter, you are not likely to get a loving reply.

Mr. FESS. Are we to be suppliants, or can we demand justice?

Mr. HARDY. You need not be suppliants. If you will send a courteous request, it will be attended to, in my judgment.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDY. I say, oh, yes! I have been no suppliant. I have notified the department of the facts existing, and every time they have paid heed and have been courteous and results have followed. I do not know what you gentlemen have done, or why you have done it, but with very little acquaintance with the men in the office, every petition that I have sent has been paid courteous regard to.

I have had brought to my attention a vast variety of requests that I secure the release of men in the Army, Marine Corps, and Navy. Several orders as to demobilization of our forces were issued shortly after the armistice was signed and copies were sent to every Senator and Congressman. I for one read these orders and instructed my secretary to follow the suggestions contained in them, and I expressed the belief that if we cooperated with the different branches of the service we would be of assistance to them and help them to accomplish a great deal, and at the same time help our boys.

Of course I, like other Congressmen, desired to serve my people, but I further appreciated the fact that these important branches of the Government were better trained to know the needs of the country than we; that is, with regard to discharges and future needs of the department.

The Surgeon General's department has had several requests from me in the matter of discharging physicians, and in every case I have received immediate and courteous replies and the cooperation of the officials here.

I know that certain rules for observance of those seeking discharge have been prescribed. I know that the officials here have been obliging in answering all questions asked them by letter or by telephone, and that by communicating with the department here I have been able to help those who have written me, in presenting their requests for discharge. My dealing in all matters with the War Department has been pleasant, but I do not believe they have done anything for me or at my request that they would not have done for any other Member of Congress under the same presentation of facts.

I sometimes found that the man asking for discharge had not made application through military channels. In such case my first action has been to advise the party to make his application and how to make it. Conditions probably exist in the military which we know nothing of, and I have always treated replies to my letters that were unfavorable to those interested as based on good reason and sound judgment. We can not know all the facts existing at the different camps. I deal fairly and frankly with the War Department, and all that I ask or desire in return is that they deal in like manner with me, and they have always done so. I could name many cases brought to the attention of the War Department not by mail alone but by telephone, which have been handled to the satisfaction of the people involved. Of course, the men who wish to be discharged had made formal application, and when the heads of the different departments here were convinced of the merits of each case the men were discharged. I insert also two letters received by me, which I think will be of interest to the people:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 20, 1919.

Hon. RUFUS HARDY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In response to your request therefor, I have prepared the following statement relative to the demobilization of the United States Army:

According to the latest available data, a total of 47,028 officers and 736,704 enlisted men were actually discharged from the military service between November 11, 1918, the date on which the armistice was signed, and January 11, 1919. The total number of troops designated for demobilization to date, including some 104,000 overseas troops which have already returned to the United States, is approximately 1,281,000.

Reports of the progress of British demobilization show that a total of 3,035 officers and 352,638 men were discharged from the service up to and including January 7, 1919. No accurate information on the demobilization of the French and Italian armies is available. During practically the same period, therefore, the ratios of demobilization among officers and enlisted men in the American and British armies have been more than 15 to 1 and 2 to 1, respectively.

Inasmuch as the French and American methods of demobilization vary markedly, it is impracticable to draw a comparison between the respective results attained in the two countries. When our soldiers are discharged they become actually separated from the service. In France, however, as the result of the system of universal military training which is there in effect, the men are demobilized in the same manner in which they are called into service, namely, by classes, or according to their respective ages, the oldest men being demobilized first. In this lies the conspicuous distinction between the results attained in the two countries, for the French soldier does not, as a consequence of the demobilization of his class, become actually separated from military service. He remains a part of the military establishment, though for the time being released from active duty, and must respond again should his class subsequently be recalled into service. There is, consequently, no necessity for physical examination and the preparation and issue of discharge papers in the case of the demobilized French soldier, but these and other routine matters must be carefully attended to before the American soldier can be duly and lawfully discharged from service. Hence it is plain that demobilization can proceed with much greater facility and far more rapidly in France than in the United States, and no just inference of unnecessary delay can be drawn, even though it prove that the demobilization of the French forces is being accomplished at a rate in excess of that prevailing in this country.

Very respectfully,

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, January 17, 1919.

Hon. RUFUS HARDY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HARDY: With reference to the visit of your secretary to my office this afternoon, I am very glad to give you the facts in regard to the difficulties the Medical Department is experiencing in the demobilization of the Army.

Numerous letters come to this office with the statement that the war is over and with urgent requests that certain officers and enlisted men be discharged from the Medical Department. It is to be hoped that the fighting part of this war is over, but we still have nearly 2,000,000 men in France and a great many thousands in our camps at home. We have 120,000 patients in our hospitals in France and something like 70,000 in the hospitals in the United States. The necessary personnel must be held in service to care for these sick soldiers. Since our troops went to France 44,000 patients have been returner to the United States; 33,000 of this number have been returned since the armistice was signed. More than 23,000 patients were returned during the month of December, and it is believed, from information received from France, that the December rate of returning patients will continue for the next three months. After that time only the sick and wounded incident to the command which may be left in France will be returned from month to month.

To meet the obligations of the Medical Department to care for the sick it is absolutely necessary for us to keep in service a sufficient personnel to run our hospitals, and in view of the large number of sick yet to come from France it is necessary for us to keep some surplus officers and men to meet the emergency in the future. If this provision is not made in advance, the department will find itself short of the necessary personnel to care for the sick and wounded and will justly be criticized for not giving the soldier the care he has been promised and which the people have a right to demand.

In order that you may know the department has not been slow in making discharges, I wish to state that from the time the armistice was signed to December 12, 9,331 have been discharged. Of this number 7,350 were medical officers, 1,124 dental surgeons, 383 veterinary surgeons, and 474 Sanitary Corps officers; 2,500 members of the Army Nurse Corps have also been discharged and returned to their civil occupations.

I sincerely trust this will give you the information you desire.

With cordial regards,

Very sincerely, yours,

M. W. IRELAND,
Surgeon General, United States Army.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, on the question to which the gentleman has just referred I want to call attention to a communication that I received this morning, a very courteous letter. A gentleman in my district has been imploring one of the officers to release a man necessary for him to open up his manufacturing business this spring. He submitted a long letter to the officer in which he begged the release of this man, and he received the following letter which he sent to me this morning and which I desire to read:

Your letter of January 9 at hand.

I thoroughly appreciate your position and trust you will be able to understand mine when I tell you that I am ordered to release men under certain rules, as follows:

(1) Those who are to resume studies in school, interrupted by their entrance in the Navy.

(2) Those having dependents who are suffering for necessities on account of their being in the service.

(3) Those who have personal business which is suffering by their absence, provided that their services can be spared.

Now, your Mr. ——— can be spared, but I do not see how any of the above rules apply to his case. I have no doubt that within the next 30 days there will be additional orders, and that they will probably include this man; but, of course, I have no definite knowledge to that effect.

Assuring you that I am desirous of doing everything I can in the premises, I am,

Yours, very truly.

If you would read the letter of this man asking the release of the young man from the service, you would believe certainly he is needed in the business. But that is not the question I desire to discuss. This officer states plainly and frankly that the young man "can be spared," but that he is absolutely helpless to let him go, in the face of the orders which he specifically sets out. There is no question about the need of the young man in the business. The letter of the officer clearly acknowledges that and apologizes in a way for not being able to do what he apparently knows should be done. All of the courteous letters he can write—as the gentleman suggests—can do no good. What is needed is some action.

We had all supposed the purpose of the order was to permit the release of men for industrial purposes. This officer is utterly unable to release him, as he states, though he "can be spared." In other words, this officer is holding a man in the service whom he does not need, while the manufacturer is calling for him in business and is desperately in need of his services. It is certainly plain that the order referred to by the officer is hopelessly wanting in its provisions to do what the department has given out it would do, to wit, release men from the service needed in the industries, or the officer is hopelessly incompetent to construe properly the order.

But, in any event, the young man is still in the service and there is a vacancy in this industry that ought to be filled promptly.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think the letter stated as the first condition those who wanted to resume school.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In an application to release a son in whom I am considerably interested, the order of release was, first, those having dependents; second, those needed in essential business; and third, those desiring to resume school work. In my letter it was put last; in yours, first.

Mr. DOWELL. And that is only in the Navy. In the Army regulations they are not permitted, as I have been told by communication from that department, to release young men to continue their school work.

In this case the letter clearly indicates that the department is wholly unable to act or is wholly unable to construe its own orders. It is a reflection upon a department that makes these orders or upon the officers who are unable to construe them properly.

In any event, the letter clearly indicates total disregard for the business interests of the country. The men needed in these industries should be released promptly, and certainly when the departments acknowledge they are no longer needed there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I am not a poker player, but I will call a bluff every time it is made. I understood the gentleman to say he would be willing to accept an amendment, although not germane to this bill, providing for the reinstatement of all civil-service employees who have rendered service, and I am now going to offer such an amendment. I introduced a bill (H. R. 29086) which covers this situation exactly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not yield.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman does not want to misquote me. I did not say I would accept it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not quoting the gentleman, but some gentleman on that side of the House. Now, there is so much talk here by gentlemen about reemployment, let us give a good example to the country; let us not blame the departments if the matter rests in our hands. Here is a chance to make good to these boys, and let us pass this amendment, so that every man who was in the Government employ will have his position when he comes home.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order so the amendment may be offered.

Mr. DOWELL. May I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 32, line 6, insert the following paragraph:

"All civil-service employees who have been drafted or enlisted in the Army and Navy shall, upon being honorably discharged from the service, be reinstated to the position and pay held at the time of such enlistment or draft."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I will have to make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not read the intervening paragraph yet.

Mr. DYER. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the Chair ruled?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not read the intervening paragraph yet.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then I withdraw my amendment for the time being.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer this amendment at the end of the paragraph, line 21, page 30, and it is only to give preference to these soldiers in the civil service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: Page 30, line 21, after the end of paragraph, insert:

"Provided, That in the appointment of employees hereunder preference, if otherwise qualified, shall be given to all persons who were in the military service in the war with Germany and who have received an honorable discharge."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, and I want to ask the gentleman this question: That is not the law now?

Mr. DYER. No; this is the law with reference to certain soldiers in the War of 1861–1865.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And also the Spanish-American War?

Mr. DYER. No.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in explanation of the point of order I shall make, I think a matter of this importance should come from the proper committee having jurisdiction of it. I do not think here upon an appropriation bill we should undertake to enact legislation of that kind.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman says it does not apply to the Spanish-American War. Why does not the gentleman introduce an amendment——

Mr. DYER. We have.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Putting legislation on the statute books applying to those soldiers?

Mr. DYER. Let me say to the gentleman, if the gentleman will give me his attention, several years ago we had in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill a similar provision to this enacted. The provision which I have presented has been presented in appropriation bills and it has been agreed to and has been the law. Of course, it only is the law for the year during the life of these appropriations, and it has been done in reference to all wars with soldiers except the present war with Germany. I am only trying to put them upon the status with the other soldiers. I will say to the gentleman that that is very reasonable and fair, and I——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would very heartily support legislation of that kind if it comes before the House in the regular way of legislation, but I can not agree for it to be placed upon this appropriation bill, and certainly without receiving any consideration, and I therefore make the point of order.

Mr. DYER. There are precedents, many of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, and including not exceeding $1,000 for expenses of attendance at meetings of public officials when specifically directed by the commission, $20,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I now offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 32, line 6, insert the following paragraph:

"All civil-service employees who have been drafted or enlisted in the Army and Navy shall, upon being honorably discharged from the service, be reinstated to the position and pay held at the time of such enlistment or draft."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Secretary of State, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; Second and Third Assistant Secretaries, at $4,500 each; Director of the Consular Service, $4,500; Undersecretary of State, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $7,500; officers to aid in important drafting work—5 at $4,500 each, 14 at $3,000 each, 17 at $2,500 each, to be appointed by the Secretary, any one of whom may be employed as chief of division of far eastern, Latin-American, near eastern, or European affairs, or upon other work in connection with foreign relations; assistant solicitors of the department, to be appointed by the Secretary—5 at $3,000 each, 2 at $2,500 each; chief clerk, who shall sign such official papers and documents as the Secretary may direct, $3,000; law clerks—1 at $2,500, 2 at $2,250 each, 3 at $2,000 each; law clerk and assistant, to be selected by the Secretary, to edit the laws of Congress and perform such other duties as may be required of them, at $2,500 and $1,500, respectively; chiefs of bureaus—2 at $2,250 each, 5 at $2,100 each; 2 translators, at $2,100 each; additional to Chief of Bureau of Accounts as disbursing clerk, $200; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; private secretary to the Undersecretary, $2,000; clerk to the Secretary, $1,800; clerks—27 of class 4, 30 of class 3, 40 of class 2, 63 of class 1 (3 of whom shall be telegraph operators), 40 at $1,000 each, 10 at $900 each; lithographer, $1,400; chief messenger, $1,000; 8 messengers; 27 assistant messengers; 4 messenger boys at $420 each; packer, $720; 7 laborers; 4 telephone-switchboard operators; chauffeur, $1,080; 10 charwomen; in all, $529,840.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask the chairman of the committee a question about this appropriation. I see there has been a considerable reduction in the appropriations to maintain the State Department. I want to ask the chairman if he has taken into consideration the fact that the work of the State Department will be very greatly increased as a result of the cessation of hostilities, that the Diplomatic Service will be largely increased and the Consular Service will be tremendously increased, and that these increases in the foreign service will greatly increase the work in the Department of State; that is, our officials here will have more work than they have ever had to do, more even than they have had to do during the war. I notice in the item next to be reached that the amount appropriated for the current year for temporary clerks was $400,000. In this bill it has been reduced to $125,000, and I would like to ask the gentleman if his committee considered the fact of the increased work that will be imposed upon this department, and if, in view of the increased work, this appropriation is sufficient?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that the committee did consider the increased work that will be devolved upon this department, and this particular paragraph just read contains a considerable increase rather than a decrease. The force is increased in the Department of State in this paragraph alone more than $78,000.

It was impossible when the hearings were had for those representing the State Department to know just what the amount of work would be in the department here during the next fiscal year. It is true at that time a considerable estimate had been submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for an increase of the Consular Service. When this bill was marked up the consular bill had not been completed and the committee had no information as to just what the Committee on Foreign Affairs was going to do with the estimates submitted to them. But we assumed that the Committee on Foreign Affairs would make an increase of the consular representatives in foreign countries, and therefore we recommended this increase of more than $78,000 for drafting officers and other employees in the department here and recommended $125,000 to be used in the employment of additional clerks. I do not know, and I take it the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] does not know, and I doubt very much if those in charge of the State Department, efficient as they are, can tell now what they will need during the next fiscal year. We are passing from a war to a peace basis. As I said yesterday, none of the heads of these departments is able to speak with any definiteness or positiveness as to the amount of work they will have on hand. But one thing is certain, as the committee believed, that $125,000 for additional employees ought to be sufficient to carry the State Department until December, when a deficiency bill can be passed, assuming that they will have all the work that the State Department says they will have.

Now, if it be true that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has recommended so many consular agents, and naturally that will greatly increase the business here in the departments, and that they need more money, then the heads of the State Department can go before the Senate committee and make out their case in view of what the Committee on Foreign Affairs has done. But I feel under those circumstances, in view of the fact that the State Department can come before Congress next December, and then, having passed through four or five months of the fiscal year, can speak positively as to the amount of increased work which has devolved on the department, and what will be needed for the remainder of the fiscal year, we ought not to build up appropriations here by way of lump sums that may or may not be used. I think it is time to keep some of the money in the Treasury or in the hands of the people, so far as we can.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I agree fully with the gentleman that now is the time Congress ought to economize, but now is not the time we ought to economize in a niggardly way with reference to the development of our foreign commerce, in the readjustment that is going to take place within the next few years. The gentleman says when these estimates were made the Department of State did not know what increase they would ask for their foreign service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD. But that now the department does know, and when this bill goes before the Senate committee the department can go before that committee and ask for proper appropriations. That is a very satisfactory suggestion, because the department does now know, or will by that time know, how the foreign service is going to be increased. We all know that the Diplomatic Service is going to be largely increased. The bill that the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported provides for two additional ministers, one to Bulgaria and one to Serbia. There will be diplomatic representatives in what are now parts of Austria, parts of Russia, and parts of Turkey. How many we do not know. In all these places we will have to supply consuls. The bill provides for an addition of about 50 consuls, and for appropriations to keep them up, and that will necessitate an additional force of clerks in Washington.

The suggestion made by the gentleman that the Department of State could come back in December and get an appropriation in a deficiency bill would not be satisfactory, because this bill has cut the appropriation from $400,000 for these clerks to $125,000, and $125,000 would not sustain the clerical force of the Department of State from the 1st of July to the 1st of December. But, as I stated, I do think the suggestion, which I take it the gentleman and the other conferees on the part of the House would concur in, that the Senate committee, with more information than the House committee had, could make the necessary allowances for this purpose is satisfactory, and I am sure will be satisfactory to the Department of State.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, unless the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] prefers to take the floor now, I would like to make a statement.

Mr. ROGERS. I will be glad to defer my reply until the gentleman has finished.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the committee in determining the amount of appropriation for the State Department in no wise sought to hamper its activities.

Shortly after the outbreak of the European war the State Department had certain additional burdens placed on it while our Government, as a neutral, was representing certain belligerent Governments, whereby the committee recognized the need for providing additional clerks. To meet that condition the committee carried for three years temporary appropriations, carrying, respectively, $54,000 and $72,000. This year that temporary force of clerks that has been provided for the past three years under two separate items was incorporated into the permanent statutory roll. On yesterday I directed attention in some brief remarks in general debate to the growing appropriations occasioned by the world war, and pointed out the increase of appropriations for the clerical force in the State Department. May I repeat the figures that I then gave?

In 1917 we appropriated for the State Department clerical force $321,000 on the statutory roll and $126,000 additional for these two temporary forces, or making an aggregate of $447,000. In 1918 that was increased by reason of a temporary appropriation to a total of $582,000. Now, we all recognize the war is over, but in this bill we have appropriated the total sum for the statutory force of $529,840, and granted to the department an additional temporary appropriation to provide for the increased work thrown upon it by reason of war activity of $125,000, or making a gross total of $654,840. In 1917 the gross total for this department was $447,000.

We are appropriating a gross total in this bill of more than 50 per cent greater than in 1917, or $654,840. There is an impression in some departments that with the increase of work it is necessary to multiply the clerical force to correspond proportionately with the increased work, and yet any person who has acquaintance with business in the slightest degree knows that many times the total activities of a business concern may multiply fourfold or tenfold and yet the clerical force required to perform that work may only need to be increased twofold.

Mr. FLOOD. I did not exactly understand how much the gentleman stated is carried in the current law for the employment of this temporary clerical force.

Mr. STAFFORD. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. FLOOD. I mean in the law of 1919.

Mr. STAFFORD. In 1919 we carried $200,000 and gave a deficiency in addition of $200,000.

Mr. FLOOD. Making $400,000?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; $400,000.

Mr. FLOOD. That you reduce to $125,000?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; we reduced that to $125,000, but we have transferred to the permanent statutory roll those temporary employees, totaling in the appropriation $126,000, which at the outbreak of the European war was intended merely for temporary employment, arising out of the exigencies occasioned by the war. We have made them a permanent part of the State Department. In three years by the appropriations to-day we have increased the total appropriation 50 per cent. The committee thought we were not hampering the State Department in its activities by providing so liberal an increase in its appropriation over that of three years ago.

Mr. FLOOD. You are reducing it over 30 per cent from what it is in the current year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. When the war was at its peak the State Department was besieged with thousands of matters which will not come up in the fiscal year that we are now appropriating for.

Mr. FLOOD. I say you are decreasing the State Department's appropriation by over 30 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; because we are recognizing that those conditions are on the decline. They will not require so much clerical force when peace is established.

Mr. FLOOD. The State Department's work will be greater in peace times than it was during the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. The State Department officials came before us when we granted this $126,000 for the temporary roll, and it was stated that it was merely to provide for those conditions where the United States Government was acting as an intermediary neutral for certain belligerent governments. We are not assuming the responsibility of other governments which were imposed upon us at that time and which they could not perform. Our State Department is relieved of that work at this time.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. In lines 10, 11, and 12 of page 32 there is an appropriation, "Undersecretary of State, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $7,500." That officer, of course, is to be known under a new name. He has been known in the past as Counselor for the Department of State.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ROGERS. He receives a salary which in amount is second only to that of the Secretary of State himself within the department. Whenever the Secretary of State is absent, as at the present time, the Undersecretary acts as Secretary of State.

While the point is rather a small one, it strikes me that he ought to be mentioned second in the roster of employees of the department rather than fifth. In other words, why in reason or otherwise should he be postponed to a place after the Assistant Secretary of State at $5,000 and the Second and Third Assistant Secretaries at $4,500 each?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will offer that amendment I will be glad to accept it.

Mr. MANN. The law requires it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The reason this position is named where it is now in the bill is that the law provided for the Assistant Secretaries. There was no law providing for an Undersecretary of State, but a law providing for a counselor.

Mr. ROGERS. I move, Mr. Chairman, to transfer the language "Undersecretary of State, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $7,500," placing it prior to the words "Assistant Secretary, $5,000; and Second and Third Assistant Secretaries, $4,500 each; Director of the Consular Service, $4,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 32, line 10, transpose the following language: "Undersecretary of State, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $7,500," in order that it will follow the language, "For Secretary of State, $12,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For temporary employees in the Department of State, $125,000: Provided, That not more than eight persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this item, to which I crave the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and also his favorable attitude.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman intend to offer the amendment?

Mr. DYER. Right at the end of the paragraph, where the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: Page 33, line 17, insert:
"Provided, That no part of any appropriation herein shall be used unless all former Government employees who resigned to enter the military service in the war with Germany shall be reinstated on application to their former positions appropriated for herein, if they have received an honorable discharge and are qualified to perform the duties of the position."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. However much sympathy I have with the object of the gentleman, I must make a point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. What is the point of order?

Mr. DYER. It is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. This is a pure limitation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It starts out as a limitation, but winds up as a strict piece of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri on the point of order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I take it that is purely a limitation upon this appropriation. In other words, it does not require the appointment of anybody or the reinstatement of anybody unless men who were in the service and resigned to enter the military service are found to be competent and qualified in every respect. If that is so, and they make application for their positions for reinstatement, then they are to be reinstated, and to that extent only is it a limitation upon the amount appropriated for herein. It has been, in effect, considered in previous bills of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee want to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have only this to say, that while the amendment starts out as a limitation, it winds up by saying that the money shall not be used unless a specific or certain thing is done. It is not a limitation upon how the money shall be expended or anything of that kind, but it seeks to enact legislation directing that a certain specific thing be done, having no connection with the appropriation. I think it is subject to the objection that it is legislation, and therefore not authorized on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we could put a provision in this bill if we wanted to that no part of the money appropriated herein shall be expended unless the people employed have green eyes; that is, so far as the point of order is concerned. The limitation as to the point of order is not a matter addressed to the discretion of Members of the House as to how they want to vote, or as to what limitation they want to put in. This is not a direction to any department of the Government to do anything which it can not now do. Under the guise of a limitation we can not put in a provision requiring a department to do a thing which under law it can not do, because that is a change of law; but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will not contend that the departments of the Government do not now have the authority to reinstate these soldiers who come home with honorable discharges, and if they have that authority we can say as a matter of limitation that they shall not expend the money unless they exercise the authority which they have, because that does not change the law at all. That is purely a limitation on the appropriation as to whether it shall be expended or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, of course, is whether or not this is a limitation, or whether in addition to being a limitation it proposes legislation. Now, the rule, as the Chair understands it, is that while it is not in order to legislate as to the qualifications of the recipients of an appropriation, the House may specify that no part of an appropriation shall be paid to persons lacking certain qualifications.

On January 30, 1901, the Agricultural appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the Clerk had read the paragraph relating to agricultural colleges, when Mr. Charles B. Landis, of Indiana, proposed this amendment:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation shall be available for the Agricultural College of Utah until the Secretary of Agriculture shall be satisfied and shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that no trustee, officer, instructor, or employee of said college is engaged in the practice of polygamy or polygamous relations.

Some debate having taken place, and Mr. WILLIAM H. KING, of Utah, having suggested a point of order, the Chairman said:

There are two reasons why the Chair would be inclined to overrule the point. In the first place, it comes rather late, and, in the second place, the amendment seems to be a limitation upon this appropriation.

The amendment having been agreed to, Mr. KING offered the following amendment:

And that no person shall be appointed a teacher or trustee in any of said colleges who has been engaged in any lynching, and until proof shall have been furnished, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Agriculture, that such teacher or trustee has not been guilty of adultery or fornication.

Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, made the point of order that the amendment was not in order.

The Chairman said:

Let the Chair state to the gentleman that the ruling on the other amendment was that that was a limitation upon the appropriation—providing that no part of this appropriation shall be paid to the agricultural college, in general terms, until it was ascertained that no teacher or trustee was a polygamist. That is a general statement of that amendment. That was a limitation upon the appropriation. Then comes this independent proposition involving legislation. * * * The Chair sustains the point of order.

Thereupon Mr. KING offered the following:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the Agricultural College of Indiana, or any other State or Territory, until the Secretary of Agriculture shall be satisfied and shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, that no trustee, officer, instructor, or employee of said college is engaged in the practice of polygamy or polygamous relations or is guilty of adultery or fornication.

Mr. Grosvenor made the point of order against the amendment.

The Chairman overruled the point of order and held that the amendment was in order.

The Chair has read from Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives, Volume IV, section 3942.

The Chair is of the opinion that the question presented by the amendment is on all fours with the one presented in the precedent cited by the Chair. The point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire two or three minutes to explain the amendment to the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We understand it.

Mr. DYER. This amendment provides nothing except that the men who were in the civil service of the Government, who resigned to enter the military or naval service, if they return with honorable discharges and are physically and otherwise qualified to go back into their old positions, and they apply for them, shall be given their positions back. That is everything this amendment provides for, and it is nothing more nor less than we have told the people of the country that these men should have. The President of the United States, I am sure, and every Member of Congress who had anything to do with the selective draft, believed that the men who gave up their positions and were called out, either through the draft or by volunteering, and went into the military service, should not lose their positions because of that service. That is all this requires.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Does the term "military service," in the opinion of the gentleman, include service in the Navy and in the Marine Corps?

Mr. DYER. It has been ruled that that includes service in all branches.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman read the amendment again?

Mr. DYER. The amendment reads:

Provided, That no part of any appropriation herein shall be used unless all former Government employees who resigned to enter the military service in the war with Germany shall be reinstated on application to their former positions appropriated for herein if they have received an honorable discharge and are qualified to perform the duties of the position.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman think that includes those who were taken in by operation of the draft?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The language is "who resigned."

Mr. DYER. They all resigned when they entered the military service. There is no difference between them, whether they entered through the selective draft or in the other way.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know as a matter of fact whether there were formal resignations in all cases?

Mr. DYER. I do not know as to that, but I think it is so construed that a man who enters the military service must resign. He can only be separated in one of two ways, by resignation or discharge.

Mr. ROGERS. Why not put in the word "left"?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am afraid that you will get into trouble about that. Make the language "enlisted or was drafted."

Mr. DYER. I have no objection to such an amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The amendment says if they are "qualified." Does the gentleman mean by that physically qualified?

Mr. DYER. That means that the men are physically qualified to perform the duties.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. You do not say physically, and if you leave it simply that if they are qualified, then that leaves it at last to the department chief, who has to make the employment, who has to accept or reject them; and if he does not want them, he will say that they are not "qualified."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Are the departments refusing to take back these men?

Mr. DYER. Yes; in some instances.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I desire one moment to support this amendment for the following reason: I received to-day a communication from Rock Island, Ill. A man who was a first-class draftsman in Rock Island left the service of the Government and enlisted in the Navy. When he was returned to Illinois he proceeded to Rock Island to secure his old position. Instead of being installed in the position he formerly held at $1,690 per year he was assigned to laboring work at $2.50 a day. It seems mighty poor reward for a man who volunteered in the service of his country when he comes home to find himself reduced from a $1,690 a year position as a first-class draftsman to the position of a laborer at $2.50 a day, and given the alternative of accepting that latter position or walking the streets. I have had to-day a most pathetic appeal to do something on the floor of this House to see that men similarly situated are accorded different treatment. I most heartily support this amendment, and hope that it will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Illinois desires to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: In the Dyer amendment strike out the following: "resigned to enter the military service," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "have been drafted or enlisted in the military or naval service of the United States."

Mr. EMERSON. Now let us have it reported as it will be if amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That no part of any appropriation herein shall be used unless all former Government employees who have been drafted or enlisted in the military or naval service of the United States in the war with Germany shall be reinstated on application to their former positions, appropriated for herein, if they have received an honorable discharge and are qualified to perform the duties of their office."

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which the gentleman from Missouri offers provided that these men should be restored if they had entered the military service, and in response to a question from me he told me that the term "military service" covers service in the Navy, the Army, and the Marine Corps.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. This is the military and naval service that is provided for now.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If the term "military service" embraces service in the Navy and the Marine Corps, it ought to be left in the amendment in that way. If we, however, say military and naval service, I am not so sure but that may exclude service in the Marine Corps. If we use a general term, it takes in everything; and if we specify, it excludes everything else.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. So far as I am concerned, if the term "military service" includes naval and Marine Corps service, I am content to strike out the words "and naval."

Mr. DYER. It does. There is no question about that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Then I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be modified by striking out the words "and naval."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Then I want to suggest this to the mover of the amendment, that we ought to put something there to indicate just what he means by the word "qualified."

Mr. DYER. I think we should leave it just as it is, because we do not want or expect the Government to take back anybody for the performance of duties in connection with the Government unless they are qualified; and this is plain enough; it shows the desire of Congress; it shows the intention, and there would never be any question about it. I do not think we ought to put in detail just what we mean by "qualified."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to what we are about to do, it seems to me from a close reading of this amendment, and I am sure the gentleman does not intend to do what I think this amendment will do if adopted. This amendment, if adopted, will prevent the employment of any of the appropriations made in this act until after the department has ascertained whether or not there are men either in the Army or Navy who have been discharged who want their positions back. The gentleman's amendment reads as follows:

Provided, That no part of any appropriation herein shall be used unless former Government employees who resigned to enter the military service in the war with Germany shall be reinstated on application to their former positions, appropriated for herein, if they have received an honorable discharge and are qualified to perform the duties of their position.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman will note it says "who have applied." It does not include anybody except those who have applied for their positions and been found qualified. We put that in specially so there will not be any trouble in that respect. They must make their application before there can be, of course, any consideration. It is only those who have applied who will be considered, and I am sure the gentleman will not find any difficulty in that respect.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. When shall they apply, at what time? I have no objection to an amendment of this kind if it is so framed as not to interfere with the service of the Government, but I think there is very serious question whether or not this amendment would not carry an appropriation.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman I am as anxious as the gentleman is that there shall be no difficulty in this respect, and pending the completion of this bill I am perfectly willing it might be submitted to anyone or it might be given all the consideration possible, and in the event there is any trouble about it we can take it up.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Missouri need not be alarmed. If we vote this provision in the bill, it will not stay in this shape when the bill becomes a law, but there will be a provision of the bill when it becomes a law providing that these men who are in the Army and who are honorably discharged shall have their positions back again, and that is subject to the point of order at this time. The gentleman in charge of the bill probably feels obliged to make the point of order, but if this provision goes into the bill temporarily I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will use his great intellect—and he has a great intellect—to put in the proper language to accomplish what we would like to accomplish now but can not because of the rule of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JUUL. If the chairman will pardon me, is this subject to a further amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. JUUL. If I can obtain unanimous consent, I would wish——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not offer an amendment in the third degree. There is already an amendment to an amendment pending.

Mr. JUUL. I would say if we insert the words "and stand ready to accept employment" we would have the evil cured.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

No money appropriated by any other act shall be used during the fiscal year 1920 for employment and payment of personal service in the Department of State in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I moved to strike out the last word for the purpose of bringing up again, with the indulgence of the committee, the subject mentioned by my friend from Texas [Mr. HARDY]. In the first place, I want to congratulate the gentleman, and if I had my hat on I would take it off to him. I bow down to him on account of his accomplishment. One lone Democrat has been able to accomplish more in the way of discharge of soldiers than all of the Republican side put together, and all the efforts that they have been making. I wish I knew how the gentleman did it. There are a number of others on this side who would like to get the recipe in some way and find out how or through whom, where, or whereby it is done.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We would like to get the formula.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Let me tell the gentleman what information I got when I called on the War Department some time ago. Perhaps about three weeks ago I went to see The Adjutant General in person in reference to this matter of discharges. I was told that absolutely nothing could be done here in Washington—absolutely nothing—and I am not the only one who has been told that same thing. I do not know whether by The Adjutant General or by whom——

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will permit, was the gentleman informed that if he should make application of the officer in command at the camp located it would be taken care of?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was told that that was the proceeding that should be instituted. They did not tell me anything in reference to such efforts as the gentleman from Texas has been making. Now, do not think that I object to the efforts of the gentleman from Texas. On the contrary, more power to his arm! I wish he could get all of these drafted men discharged, and if he will come over to my office when he has not any other employment I will give him 50 or 100 more to work on, and I hope he will be as successful as he was with the others.

Mr. HARDY. Has the gentleman followed the directions given him?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes. They applied, and their applications were left in some cases for two months without any consideration.

Mr. HARDY. Has the gentleman given all those facts to the officers here and not gotten any satisfaction at all?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have gone to the officers and have gotten no result. I do not know what the gentleman calls satisfaction. I can not complain of being treated discourteously as far as that is concerned. I never have been treated otherwise than courteously by any officer of any standing.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman has never been treated discourteously here.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; as far as that is concerned, I have no complaint. Let me tell the gentleman another thing in reference to some of these efforts. I got a letter the other day saying it was discussed by the officers of a certain camp to whom these vouchers were presented that if there were any efforts made to use political influence, meaning anything a Congressman did to alleviate the needs of these men and the hardship of their situation, or any attempt to tell the department, or even writing the officers by writing what the facts were and the urgency of the case, that that would be marked up against the applicants and counted against their record in the future. I hope the gentleman will not get into that kind of trouble.

Mr. HARDY. I will state to the gentleman my recollection is that upon a little impudence in a letter by some man when taken to the department they have brought the fellow over the coals.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am very glad to hear that——

Mr. HARDY. I think if attention was called to the fact that a commanding officer or anyone else replied in any other way but politely that——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The great trouble appears to be not that they do not reply politely, but often they do not reply at all. I never have received any replies that were not perfectly polite except one from a second lieutenant, and I took into consideration that it was from a boy who probably did not think how it sounded.

But it is the exception to find a lieutenant who is not courteous.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I was just going to say that I have written to the commanding officers in the cantonments, and they will not give me a reply at all. They absolutely ignore any letter or suggestion I make.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. I do not like to take up the gentleman's time, but I had an experience similar to the one that was mentioned, except that when I had received a statement from the commanding officer of the camp that the man would be punished if I interfered further I went to The Adjutant General and he sustained the commanding officer, and said that he was correct in stating that the soldier would be punished if he obtained congressional interference.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The trouble is the gentleman is not in the right locality. He is on the right side of the House, but something is wrong or he would be as successful as my friend from Texas. But the gentleman from Georgia has stated a case where he should have had the gentleman from Texas have the party "hauled over the coals." Congress employs all these men, both high and low, and it should not put up with such conduct, whether it be on the part of The Adjutant General or somebody lower down. But I would want to have all the facts in the case before I convicted The Adjutant General. I can readily understand that there might be improper interference. On the other hand, it is not improper to write the commanding officer what a Congressman knows with reference to a case, and an insolent reply should be punished. Members of Congress know more about the facts in these cases than anyone else. They know what the situation is with reference to these men and their dependents, and their recommendations ought to be considered.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of the Treasury, $12,000; assistant to the Secretary, $5,000; 3 Assistant Secretaries, at $5,000 each; 2 additional Assistant Secretaries, at $5,000 each, in accordance with the authority contained in the deficiency-appropriation act approved October 6, 1917; clerk to the Secretary, $3,000; executive clerk, $2,400; stenographer, $1,800; 3 private secretaries, 1 to each Assistant Secretary, at $1,800 each; Government actuary, under control of the Treasury, $4,000; clerks—3 of class 4 (2 of whom shall act as private secretaries to the additional Assistant Secretaries authorized by the deficiency act of Oct. 6, 1917), 4 of class 3, 2 of class 2; chief messenger, $1,100; 2 assistant chief messengers, at $1,000 each; messengers—3 at $900 each, 5 at $840 each; in all, $78,200, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of calling attention to the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has recently been pronounced insufficient for the then incumbent. Touching that proposition, I have no desire to say that it is any more than any occupant should have. I have a great regard for the present occupant of that position. What the Secretary is paid this $12,000 for is not for the purpose of creating a large expense to the country or causing a large expense of his own energy in developing and carrying out so-called policies not in harmony with the laws of the land as passed by Congress.

I read recently of the newly appointed Director General of the Railroads that his policy was to be the same policy as that of his predecessor. I understand it is the duty of a Secretary to carry out the policies outlined by the law-making body of the country and not those particular policies, beliefs, or doctrines derived from former prejudices, political beliefs, or directions of administration in conflict with the laws passed by Congress. We have recently been voting a large amount of long-time national indebtedness. Twenty-two billion dollars have been authorized and sixteen billions, roundly speaking, sold to the people. The people were called upon to buy that amount of bonds, and they responded. A large amount of that has been paid to maintain the Army, a considerable amount for the Navy, and generous sums for other purposes; but the largest single item—in fact, more than one-half of the amount realized from the sale of long-time bonds of this country—has been loaned to foreign countries. The amount now is something over $8,500,000,000, an enormous sum. It is nearly three times the amount of the total assets of the National Treasury, outside of the due bills that we have taken from these foreign countries. This amount in gold would load a train of cars 5½ miles long; each car with 50,000 avoirdupois pounds of gold in it. That would be more than one-half of the gold produced in the world in the last 500 years. Whether or not legislative authority of the countries borrowing was behind this paper is information that has never been vouchsafed to us. I do not charge that it has not been done; but the information has not come.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Does the gentleman know whether or not there are any bonds held by us against the foreign nations for this debt?

Mr. SLOAN. Not a single long-time bond. Moreover, Secretary McAdoo who has just left the Cabinet was inquired of as to when these temporary certificates, or whatever you may see fit to call them, would be converted into long-time bonds as the American people expected. Yes; as the Congress said they should be converted. That is why I am talking about the policy of a national or a Cabinet officer. Some day we will have to settle whether the policies of an administration including Cabinet officers on the one hand or the Constitution adopted by the people and the laws of Congress on the other is the law of the land.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is only fair to say that Congress only made that definite provision in regard to the 3½ per cent issue and not in regard to those subsequent.

Mr. SLOAN. Only made it definite; yes. It was kept in a rather indefinite form in the later issues. But the gentleman, who is a member of the Ways and Means Committee, knows that the reason why it was left indefinite was because it was said to be inconvenient in the hurry of making these loans to convert them into the more formal loans called long-time loans, and a reasonable time and opportunity was given under the enactments to enable conversion to be conveniently made. There is authority for their conversion in all of the issues and that authority was practically a command. That authority has not been used, and the question is whether it will be used or not. Demand notes, such as were taken, were never considered and there was no proper authority for their being taken. The law speaks about converting these short-time loans before maturity. But demand notes are not short-time notes. They are no-time notes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is entirely right in saying that none of them have been converted, but Congress only provided that the three and one-half's should be converted, and has not definitely provided that the others should.

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, no; not definitely as to when the later loans should be converted.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I would like to ask how much of that money went to Russia?

Mr. SLOAN. I will give the figures. I do not have them right before me.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Do you recollect how much?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think it is substantially $300,000,000. My recollection is that the Secretary told us that about $300,000,000 had been loaned to Russia.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Were the due bills given by the Kerensky government?

Mr. SLOAN. One hundred and eighty-seven million seven hundred and seventy-nine thousand dollars was loaned to Russia. A greater sum was authorized.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Was a due bill given by the Kerensky government?

Mr. SLOAN. I presume it was, and it was signed by the diplomat representing the Government of Russia when Kerensky was in power. That is as I understand it. I am not giving it as absolutely definite.

Here I give the amounts of our foreign loans at the beginning of the year. They have been considerably increased since then:

Great Britain	$3,945,000,000
Belgium	212,855,000
Cuba	15,000,000
Czecho-Slovak	7,000,000
France	2,436,427,000
Greece	39,554,000
Italy	1,210,000,000
Liberia	5,000,000
Roumania	6,666,666
Russia	187,729,750
Serbia	12,000,000
Total	8,464,542,416

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon one more question?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. As to the statement made here by the gentleman from Nebraska, is it not a fact that if we had interest-bearing coupon bonds of the nations borrowing the money, with the interest derived from those bonds they would be almost sufficient to pay the indebtedness of the new securities held in this country for bonds which we have issued ourselves?

Mr. SLOAN. They would meet a large portion of our indebtedness. That has been explained to the American people. Thirty million dollars was paid out as expense in issuing our bonds, which the people purchased. It has been explained in every hall in this country that we were loaning the money to the allies——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

Mr. SLOAN. So that the boys, when they went and fought the battles of our country and came home, and in the course of 20 or 30 years had reached their maximum as wealth producers, they would not be forced into the position of having to pay the bonds as well as having won the war. So it was understood by the American people that these bonds taken from other countries would be the same practically as our bonds, remembering the distinction made by the gentleman from Ohio. The American people allowed those loans to be made upon this assumption that when the last war indebtedness due was demanded our foreign loans then due would pay them. Now, then, when the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means asked the former Secretary of the Treasury about what was done about conversion, that official wrote as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, November 5, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. KITCHIN: Your letter of the 28th ultimo has been duly received, asking for certain information regarding the conversion of the obligations of the allied Governments purchased under section 2 of the first liberty bond act into long-time obligations.

I take pleasure in advising you that none of the foreign obligations purchased pursuant to the authority of the first liberty bond act or the second liberty bond act or the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto have been converted into long-time obligations, and no definite decision has been reached as to when, whether, or to what extent such conversion should be made.

If there ever was fine scorn sent from a Cabinet officer to the law-making body of this country, it is embodied in that letter. Reduced to an interrogatory, it is: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon another question?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman remember whether the English Government has ever presented this matter to the Parliament, or whether it has ever been presented to the French Congress for ratification in any way?

Mr. SLOAN. I do not know. I hold in my hand and will present for this RECORD a statement of England's estimated indebtedness, and there is no reference that any man can find to a dollar of indebtedness due from Great Britain to the American people. There is just one reference to an American loan; but that loan was made in 1916 and it refers, of course, to a loan secured by various securities sold in America, but it was not a loan made from the American Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know whether these due bills or certificates which our Treasury Department holds as evidence of those debts are interest bearing or not?

Mr. SLOAN. I understand they are interest bearing and that interest has been paid upon them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At the rate of 5 per cent.

Mr. SLOAN. But there is nothing except the authority that we gave them to collect the interest that we were to pay upon obligations of the same tenor and effect—our own obligations—which would relate to time and maturity and rate of interest and other essential elements, including gold standard of value of money payments, interest and principal.

Now, why the largest asset in the American Treasury—nearly three times, as I said before, all other assets in our Treasury—is not quoted in our daily report of the Treasury, and why our largest debtor, in the classification of its debts, said nothing specific about our loan I do not understand. I could find nothing in the Congressional Library more definite, nor could the men engaged in legislative research over there find any more definite statement in any recognized British work—anything showing what the amount of the American loan to the British Government was. I presume it is included somewhere in the various items of the statement, but where I can not locate.

I do not criticize that particularly, only it would seem that in the international bookkeeping these obligations should have been recognized and designated as, "The loan made Britain by the American Government amounts to so much," or to that effect.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman be kind enough to say as to the source of the statement he has there?

Mr. SLOAN. The statement I have was published in the official document issued under the direction of the President of the United States, known as the Official Bulletin, and heretofore under the immediate direction of one George Creel. The statement I here attach:

RECENT ESTIMATE OF BRITISH WAR DEBT ACCORDING TO THE LONDON ECONOMIST.

According to the London Economist (Sept. 28, 1918), the national debt of the United Kingdom shows the following growth since August 1, 1914:

Of the total war-time expenditure of £8,268,332,809, according to the Economist, £2,119,214,607, or 25.6 per cent, was met by revenue, and £6,149,118,202, or 74.4 per cent, by net borrowings. Expenditures include advances of the British Government to allies and dominions, which, according to official announcement (see London Statist, Aug. 3, 1918, p. 175), by the end of July, 1918, had reached a total of £1,610,500,000, composed of £1,275,500,000 advanced to the allies, of £208,000,000 advanced to dominions, and £126,500,000 of accrued interest, etc.

Loans to allies show the following distribution:

Russia	£568,000,000
France	402,000,000
Italy	313,000,000
Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, and Greece	119,000,000
	1,402,000,000

For the financial year 1918–19 it is estimated loans to allies will increase by £300,000,000, and loans to dominions by £50,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the gentleman's time extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Nebraska be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would say to my friend from Nebraska that I do not think any legislative action has been taken by either the French or the British Governments. I read the Parliamentary Debates of the British Government and glance over the résumé of the acts of the French Government, being able to understand French sufficiently for that purpose, and I never have seen any mention that either of those Governments has taken any such legislative action. Of course, it is possible I might have overlooked it.

Mr. SLOAN. I have kept watch over that proposition as well as I could. I do not claim that the Treasury Department has failed to take an acknowledgment of the indebtedness of these various countries to this Government; but when we loaned more than half the proceeds of all our bond issues, which have been bought by people of the United States, and we as a Congress had definitely directed what should be done with the first loan and modified the statement for the other loans, as we were assured, simply as a matter of convenience for the Treasury to ultimately carry out the purpose and spirit of the loans, good faith demands a compliance of the direct mandate and implied direction.

It would be unfortunate and humiliating if every man who went before his people and asked them to stand by the Government and pledge their money and their credit for the purpose of winning the war and of relieving the boys who fought the war 20 or 30 years hence from having to pay for the prosecution of the war, to have the Treasurer of the United States say he does not know whether, or to what extent, or when there will be any compliance with the law passed by Congress.

The authority for the making of foreign loans is found in the first and second bond authorization acts, as follows:

First—

[Public, No. 3, 65th Cong.; H. R. 2762.]

An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase, at par, from such foreign governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act; to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity, but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign governments, converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act. For the purposes of this section there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds from foreign governments, as aforesaid, shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to receive on or before maturity payment for any obligations of such foreign governments purchased on behalf of the United States, and to sell at not less than the purchase price any of such obligations and to apply the proceeds thereof, and any payments made by foreign governments on account of their said obligations to the redemption or purchase at not more than par and accrued interest of any bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act; and if such bonds are not available for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem or purchase any other outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States which may at such time be subject to call or which may be purchased at not more than par and accrued interest.

Second—

[Public, No. 43, 65th Cong.; H. R. 5901.]

An act to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to establish credits with the United States for any foreign governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States; and, to the extent of the credits so established from time to time, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase, at par, from such foreign governments, respectively, their several obligations hereafter issued, bearing such rate or rates of interest, maturing at such date or dates, not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act, or of such act approved April 24, 1917, and containing such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine, or to make advances to or for the account of any such foreign governments and to receive such obligations at par for the amount of any such advances; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such obligations shall not be less than the highest rate borne by any bonds of the United States which, at the time of the acquisition thereof, shall have been issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act, and any such obligations shall contain such provisions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine for the conversion of a proportionate part of such obligations into obligations bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest, but the rate of interest in such foreign obligations issued upon such conversion shall not be less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to enter into such arrangements from time to time with any such foreign governments as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for the payment of such obligations of foreign governments before maturity. For the purposes of this section there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000,000,000, and in addition thereto the unexpended balance of the appropriations made by section 2 of said act approved April 24, 1917, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to establish credits for foreign governments, as aforesaid, shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, from time to time, to exercise in respect to any obligations of foreign governments acquired under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, any privilege of conversion into obligations bearing interest at a higher rate provided for in or pursuant to this act or said act approved April 24, 1917, and to convert any short-time obligations of foreign governments which may have been purchased under the authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, into long-time obligations of such foreign governments, respectively, maturing not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, as the case may be, and in such form and terms as the Secretary of Treasury may prescribe; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such long-time obligations at the time of their acquisition shall not be less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations so converted into such long-time obligations; and, under such terms and conditions as he may from time to time prescribe, to receive payment, on or before maturity, of any obligations of such foreign governments acquired on behalf of the United States under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, and, with the approval of the President, to sell any of such obligations (but not at less than the purchase price with accrued interest unless otherwise hereafter provided by law), and to apply the proceeds thereof, and any payments so received from foreign governments on account of the principal of their said obligations, to the redemption or purchase, at not more than par and accrued interest, of any bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917; and if such bonds can not be so redeemed or purchased the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem or purchase any other outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States which may at such time be subject to redemption or which can be purchased at not more than par and accrued interest.

It will be observed that under the first $3,000,000,000 in foreign loans were authorized. Under the second there was authority for four billions. In the later bills authorizations raised amounts for foreign loans to $10,000,000,000 total. No material change was made about terms of conversion.

Consideration of this matter has become important, because within 30 days it has been seriously suggested by prominent sentimentalists that these debts be forgiven and canceled. If such a course were seriously considered by Congress or the administration, there would be little market for another issue of United States bonds.

Quite recently it has been proposed that these evidences of indebtedness might be sold for ready money on the market and let the next generation pay the $10,000,000,000 coming due in 20 or 30 years. That would be equivalent to a guardian selling the securities of his ward to pay the guardian's own proper debt, hoping that the ward would forget, or at least forgive, the misapplication on settlement day.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. If I have understood the remarkable speech of the gentleman correctly, the gentleman has practically stated here this afternoon that there is a doubt in his mind whether or not the gentlemen acting for these foreign governments had legislative authority back of them.

Mr. SLOAN. I am not emphasizing that particularly.

Mr. JUUL. I want the gentleman to state directly if he knows whether there was legislative authority back of the loans made by this country to these other foreign governments?

Mr. SLOAN. I do not know, because those who had charge of the loans, and to whose audience we were not admitted, have not given us that information. I have spoken of this not for idle criticism. The present Secretary of the Treasury has said to the country that the new bond issue of $5,000,000,000 was not to be a commercial one. That it is to be based upon an appeal to the patriotism of the people. It would seem to me that one of the best ways to go to the people asking for a loan of $5,000,000,000, not as a matter of investment, but as a matter of patriotism, would be to carry out in good faith the pledge made to the people of the United States and the pledge made to the 4,000,000 American soldiers now or heretofore in the service. It would seem to me that if they are talking about policies, it would be a very good time for our new Secretary of the Treasury, when this new bond issue is about to be made, to say to the American people, "I am going to carry out the pledge made to the American people. I am going to convert these sight drafts or due bills, or whatever they are, into long-time bonds, corresponding with the bonds that were sold to the American people," so that 20 or 30 years from now, when the bonds come due, the boys will say, 'Yes; we will pay them.' Congress in 1918 and 1919 provided a trust fund invested in foreign securities to pay these American securities when they came due. Use them for the purpose for which they were taken."

Mr. SHERWOOD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that more than one-half of the four issues of liberty bonds have been loaned abroad?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is that the gentleman's statement?

Mr. SLOAN. Something over $8,500,000,000 have been loaned abroad and about $16,000,000,000 liberty bonds have been sold.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman's time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. In connection with the $8,000,000,000 which the gentleman says have been loaned to various European Governments, do I understand that there has not been a satisfactory accounting for it up to this time?

Mr. SLOAN. I have gone into details. I would leave the question as to "a satisfactory accounting" to the judgment of the House. It has not been satisfactory to me.

Mr. FOCHT. Is it not up to the Congress to call upon the authorities to see that there is an accounting?

Mr. SLOAN. I think Congress ought to rise to its duty in a number of respects, and this subject is one of them.

Mr. FOCHT. I am quite in accord with that view.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to enforce the provisions of the act of March 23, 1910 (36 Stat., p. 241), when instituting inquiry into the solvency of bonding companies doing business with the Government, $5,000; the expense of each examination to be reimbursed by the bonding company examined.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee having charge of this measure if the purpose of this is to have the Government make an investigation of a bonding company with which it is transacting business?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. As to its solvency, and then require the bonding company to pay the expense of the investigation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It does that now under the law.

Mr. WALSH. This is new law in this bill, is it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Government makes the investigation now under the law and the bonding company pays the expense of it.

Mr. WALSH. No; the part requiring the bonding company to reimburse the expense of such examination is new legislation. Does the gentleman contend that that is a wise policy for the Government?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Many of the bonding companies do quite a large business with the Government. They are very solicitous about securing that business. Now, it is necessary for the Government to make such investigations from time to time to determine whether or not they are solvent and their bonds are sufficient protection to the Government. The very fact that they do business with the Government, outside of the fees that they receive, is in itself worth a great deal to each company. My impression is that the law now provides that the bonding companies shall pay these expenses. I may be mistaken in that. It is being looked up so as to be certain.

Mr. WALSH. The effect of this legislation is substantially this: The bonding company seeking to do business with the Government will come to some official and say, "We would like to furnish these bonds or underwrite this liability, and if you will send your experts to examine our books as to our solvency and give us this business, why we will pay all the expenses of the examination."

It would seem to me that if the Government is going to do business with a concern and conduct an examination as to the financial responsibility of the concern, that where the Government is making that examination for its own protection the Government ought to be able to pay for it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Under the law every company doing a bonding business with the Government is required to file with the Secretary of the Treasury a statement, signed and sworn to by its president and secretary, showing its assets and liabilities. That report must be filed in the months of January, April, July, and October. Then the Secretary of the Treasury has the power and it is made his duty to revoke the authority of any such company to transact any new business under this act whenever, in his judgment, that company is not solvent or is conducting its business in violation of the act. I submit the only way the Secretary of the Treasury can determine whether or not the company is solvent is by an examination.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And this provision here is simply to pay the initial expenses necessary to make these investigations from time to time. They are to be made only in case where from the report filed it is apparent some investigation should be made.

Mr. WALSH. But the bonding company is required to reimburse the expenses, that is to say, to pay for the examination. The Government might through this method do all of its business with one company.

Mr. GARNER. We want an examination of a particular company. We say, "It is very expensive, and we have no money to do it with, and therefore we will have but one company that we are doing business with, and we will decline to do business with another bonding company."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And, as the gentleman from Nebraska suggests, that is true in case of insurance companies.

Mr. WALSH. That is for the protection of the policyholders.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I still further reserve the point of order.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. EMERSON. Is this agreeable to the insurance companies?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have not consulted the insurance companies as to whether it is agreeable.

Mr. EMERSON. I did not know but that something happened before the committee that would indicate that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This recommendation was made by the Treasury Department.

Mr. LOBECK. And there is no question that the insurance companies or the bonding companies are very willing to pay for the examination, to have their companies examined, so that the Government may know that they are reliable.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure that they are willing to pay the expense.

Mr. WALSH. They are willing to pay for a certificate of good character issued by Uncle Sam.

Mr. LOBECK. Why should Uncle Sam pay for it?

Mr. WALSH. If the Government is going to require an investigation as to the solvency of a bonding company which is soliciting its business, the question is whether or not it would not be better for the Government to pay for the expense of that examination, rather than make the bonding company reimburse it. Would it not lead to more efficiency in the examination that is to be made?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think so. I can not understand why it would have that effect.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Why can not the Government issue its own bonds without all of this intervening process, providing for an examination and paying for it?

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Government is in the business of issuing bonds, though I do not know that they are bonds of this character.

Mr. GARD. I mean bonds for its employees, trust bonds.

Mr. FOSTER. The insurance companies do not want to go into that business.

Mr. LOBECK. The Government carries its own insurance.

Mr. WALSH. What is the explanation of the matter, taken in conjunction with the statute that the gentleman read?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is put in here simply so that we may be certain that these companies are going to be examined from time to time, and that the Government will not stand to lose possibly hundreds of thousands of dollars by some company becoming insolvent.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the gentleman would not contend that simply because the Government has made an examination as to the solvency of the company, therefore it could not become insolvent.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not at all, but I submit to the gentleman that if we are simply to take the statements filed during these months that I have named and make no investigation of the books of the company and their assets at any time, it is entirely possible that insolvent companies might be carrying bonds and that ultimately the Government might stand to lose many thousands of dollars in the case of some particular defalcation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of War Risk Insurance: For expenses of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, as authorized by law: For salaries of the director and commissioners, and of such deputies, assistants, accountants, experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, $9,509,630; stationery and minor office supplies, $150,000; miscellaneous expenses, including telephones, telegrams, freight, express, foreign postage, not exceeding $100 for street car fares, and not exceeding $500 for law books, books of reference, and periodicals, $25,000; printing and binding, to be done at the Government Printing Office, and necessary printing of forms, etc., for use abroad may be done abroad, $125,000; furniture, equipment, and supplies, $175,000; traveling expenses (exclusive of field investigations), $5,000; salaries and expenses of employees engaged in field investigations and expenses of not more than eight temporary branch offices, $1,000,000; in all, $10,989,630: Provided, That all employees appropriated for by this paragraph shall be engaged exclusively on the work of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance during the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts has reserved the point of order. Ought not that to be disposed of before the amendment is offered?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts insist upon his point of order?

Mr. WALSH. I reserve the point of order. I reserve the point of order to the proviso for the purpose of making inquiry as to why you provide that none of the employees of this bureau may be discharged during the year 1920?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is no such provision, I will say to the gentleman, as that.

Mr. WALSH. Well, it says, "Provided, That all employees appropriated for by this paragraph shall be engaged exclusively on the work of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance during the fiscal year 1920."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That was put on simply for the protection of the Treasury and this bureau as well. Here is a lump sum out of which these employees are paid. Now, we want to be sure that those who are employed out of that lump sum are employed upon the work of this War Risk Bureau, and not appointed to the War Risk Bureau roll and transferred to some other bureau of the Treasury Department.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman wants to make sure that those employees down there are employed exclusively by the War Risk Bureau?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think this is going to add to the efficiency of the bureau?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope it will. It will not detract from it.

Mr. WALSH. If they transfer about a thousand to some other department it will be the greatest move toward efficiency in the bureau that could be taken.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This provision will certainly subtract from some of the excuses we have heard here in the past as to the failure to pay allotments and allowances promptly, but whether it does that or not the gentleman can see this very clearly, if authority is given to employ persons out of this lump sum and they are put on the rolls of the bureau and then transferred to some other bureau of the Government, either the work of the bureau may be crippled or this fund may be used for other Government work. What the committee was trying to do was to see to it that the fund here appropriated is used exclusively for the work of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and not provide a lump sum for half a dozen other bureaus in the Treasury Department.

Mr. WALSH. Has that practice prevailed during the past year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not in this bureau. A similar provision has been carried for a great number of years with reference to The Adjutant General's office in the War Department.

Mr. WALSH. There are half a dozen other bureaus here where there is no such proviso as that, and if nothing like that has occurred what was there to lead the committee to fear that a large number of these employees might be transferred? We are discharging employees; we are even inviting them to resign and holding out inducements that their traveling expenses will be paid to their homes when the measure that has been signed in a foreign land reaches this country by ocean steamship in the future.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The hearings disclose there were employees detailed out of the War Risk Bureau at the time these hearings were held whose salaries aggregate $25,840.

Mr. WALSH. To what branches were they detailed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There were four or five to the office of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Love, another one to the chief clerk of the Treasurer's office, another one to the Secretary's office, and still another to the office of the chief clerk, and two more to the office of Secretary Love, and one to the office of the Secretary.

Mr. WALSH. The Secretary and Mr. Love have both separated themselves from the service, have they not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know, but the positions still exist.

Mr. WALSH. It was not the position that caused the transfer; it was probably the men, and if those gentlemen have resigned, it is likely the new Secretary will not require the services of these men.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope not, but there can be no harm in this provision.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not think these employees were transferred unnecessarily, and if they were not we do not want to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from having these employees in the future if he needs them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has been the contention of the committee and the Congress for years that where a bureau needs employees they should come here through regular estimates and tell the Congress what the needs are, so Congress will be able to make the proper appropriations. We do not want to make an appropriation of $10,000,000 for employees in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and have a number of them transferred to some other bureau of the department.

Mr. WALSH. The only number that have been transferred in amount aggregate some $25,000 in salary.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Twenty-five thousand eight hundred and forty dollars.

Mr. WALSH. And those were transferred to the Secretary's office and the Assistant Secretary who had charge of this particular bureau.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman there are six of them who have been transferred to the office of the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, and certainly he has nothing to do except in a general way with this bureau. There were eight of them transferred to the office of Assistant Secretary Love. Now, he is in charge of this bureau as Assistant Secretary, and, of course, I take it this provision would not affect him. There was one transferred to the office of Assistant Secretary Rowe and one to the Treasurer's office.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman the figures here showing the number of employees in the War Risk Bureau and the average rate of compensation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; I think I have those facts. There are some 13,000, including those under contract. I can give the gentleman the exact number in a short time. There are over 9,000 on the rolls paid an annual salary and something over 4,000 who are employed under contract.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman the average rate of compensation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; I have that. I can not tell the gentleman exactly the average rate, but my recollection is it is about $1,100 a year, or a little more.

Mr. WALSH. Are there not three classes of employees rather than two?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will find a complete explanation on page 1008 of the hearings.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not put it in the RECORD, so as to let us have it?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this is clearly——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I find the average salary is $1,117.

Mr. WALSH. It is clearly a legislative provision upon this paragraph, and is not a limitation in any way that I can see.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is a limitation, I will say to the gentleman, pure and simple.

Mr. WALSH. It is rather a requirement that the money shall be expended in a certain way. I will withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Gentlemen, I have always contended that the Government can not conduct any business as efficiently as a private individual can. I do not believe the Government ought to engage in any kind of business unless it is absolutely necessary as a part of the police powers of the country or for the purpose of maintaining the morals or health of the people. In other words, I never have believed in any more government than was absolutely necessary to maintain the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness of the people.

When the bill relative to the War Risk Insurance Bureau was proposed here it was stated that it was not the intention of the Government to go into the insurance business, but that on account of the fact that these men who are apt to go into the military service might be injured, and on account of the fact that their insurable value was to be taken away from them on their entrance into the Military Establishment, we ought to take the place of it by some adequate insurance. With this idea I was heartily in accord. It was then stated by those who were proponents of the bill that as soon as the men got out of the service, if they were able to get insurance in other places, it was the purpose of the Government to have them drop the insurance, and only carry those who could not get insured any place else. The manifest purpose of the War Risk Insurance Bureau or the Government now, so far as either seems to have any control over this, is to continue men in this insurance taking their insurance from the Government and continue the Government in the insurance business as to all those who now have policies with it. The hearings show, I understand, that about four million have embraced the provisions of this act and have made application and are now carrying insurance under its terms. And the War Risk Insurance Bureau in all its material that it publishes and puts out insists and urges that the men be asked to continue this governmental insurance.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes, I yield to a question.

Mr. FESS. The new director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau stated before the Rules Committee in the hearings that the Government, in his judgment, never would discontinue the insurance along this line.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. So it is now the purpose, gentlemen, of the Government of the United States to embark in the insurance business on a large scale and to carry, if possible, a large insurance business, now totaling approximately 4,000,000 policyholders. We can not do it as we can do any other business, as efficiently and as economically as it can be done by those established agencies that have been doing this kind of business for years.

And in order to illustrate what I have stated here, I want to call your attention to the expense that is now connected with the running of this War Risk Insurance Bureau. I protested when this bill was up here, and when it was being passed, as did some others, that we ought to use the established machinery of the Pension Bureau, so far as it was possible, at that time having over 900 employees and something like 4,500 field examiners, for this purpose, but those who proposed the bill would not have anything to do with that bureau, and said it could not be done. We are now running this with approximately 4,000,000 policyholders, and I want you gentlemen on this committee to notice some comparisons that I shall make. We have at this time on the permanent roll of the War Risk Insurance Bureau 11,108 employees.

Mr. MADDEN. You have more than that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am talking about the permanent roll. It has 11,108 employees. I got these figures this morning from the director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance himself, and I therefore presume they are authentic. You will observe that this bill carries appropriations of approximately $10,000,000 for this bureau for the next fiscal year. Do you know what the pay roll of the permanent employees is at present in this bureau? It is $12,502,600, exceeding the amount named in the bill by $2,000,000, just for the simple item of the permanent employees in the bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. How many temporary employees have they?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There are three classes, as were mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts a moment ago.

There are the permanent employees; the contract roll, so called; and the piece-rate roll. On the contract roll there are approximately 945 employees. On the piece-rate roll—that is, those who are brought in to work by the piece—there are 2,450 employees. The contract roll costs us per year $926,470, or about $1,000,000. The piece-rate roll, 2,450 employees, costs $1,567,306 a year. Or we have a total pay roll in Washington—and now I am not including the field operators or the class that is working out over the country making investigations or the New York office, but I am including simply the Washington employees—of $14,996,376.76, or approximately $15,000,000 a year for these men here in the city of Washington.

Now, there is no overhead charge in that; there is no office expense. There is nothing else. It costs us $15,000,000 a year to carry the pay roll of employees who are running this War Risk Insurance Bureau now, and they are handling, gentlemen, 4,000,000 claims. A large part of that work is taken away and is now being performed by the Quartermaster Department of the United States Army, namely, the allotment work.

Let me call your attention to what is being done by some of the life insurance companies of the country. I have no interest in these life insurance companies. I give this information directly as I get it from the presidents and secretaries of the various companies from whom I have obtained it. In September a year ago the New York Life was carrying a million policies. It had on its pay roll 1,683 employees, who were doing all that business. The Mutual Life Insurance Co., of New York, had 600,000 policies, and it had 2,000 employees. Now, notice these figures as to the Prudential. The Prudential Insurance Co. had 15,000,000 policyholders and had 28,000 field men, agents, solicitors, and all kinds of employees to handle those 15,000,000 policies.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Twenty-eight thousand employees?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; 28,000 employees to handle those 15,000,000 policies. Now, the Prudential policies, as I understand them, gentlemen, are policies where their collections are made largely monthly or weekly; that is, the great bulk of their business is conducted by the month, or in certain periods, and necessarily a great many field men or solicitors are necessary.

Now, how many employees did it take to run this business per million? The New York Life takes 1,683 employees to handle a million policies. The Mutual Life has about 2,200 employees, with 600,000 policies. The Prudential took 1,866 employees per million. If the Prudential Life could handle the bulk of business that is being handled by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, on the same proportion they would do it with 7,464 employees. Instead of 7,464 employees we have, approximately, as has been said here, 14,503 employees. In other words, in order to handle the business that we ought to handle with 7,464 employees we are using over 14,000 to do it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman wants to be fair. Surely the gentleman does not contend that we are carrying 14,000 employees to attend to simply the insurance features of the War Risk Insurance Bureau?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I mean that we are having that many men to carry on the business of 4,000,000 policyholders.

Mr. RAYBURN. In the Army?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Fourteen thousand people.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I said so. Does the gentleman doubt it?

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman surely does not want to convey the impression that in the insurance division of the War Risk Insurance Bureau there are 14,000 employees. The insurance division is not the largest division.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understand it is the biggest end of the business.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman must know that more than half of the employees in the War Risk Bureau are in the allotment and allowance divisions.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me answer the gentleman's question. I said there were 4,000,000 policyholders in the war-risk insurance business being handled by that bureau. The allotments and allowances and the insurance business, of course, is being done, but a large part of the allotments are being handled by the Quartermaster Department of the Army, and the work being done on the insurance policies is no greater than that which is being done by the Prudential or the New York Life or the New York Mutual.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The director stated that the insurance division has now only 2,400 employees.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not care what the director says. I know that the employees are there, and they are being hired and paid for, and I know that they have 4,000,000 policyholders in the Army and Navy to attend to. We know what their business is. We know it is to take care of the allowances and allotments and insurance.

Mr. RAYBURN. And compensation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is a small amount.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. How many years has it taken the New York Life Insurance Co. to put a million policyholders on its books?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I can not say.

Mr. STEVENSON. Four million have been put on the books here. The New York Life Insurance Co. has been in business since 1850.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What has that to do with the proposition that I am now submitting, that it takes twice as many employees for us to do the same bulk of business as it would take a private institution?

Mr. STEVENSON. It has this to do with it: That if the New York Life Insurance Co. undertook to put 4,000,000 policyholders on its books in one year, it would have to largely increase its force, would it not?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not know about that.

Mr. RAYBURN. And the gentleman says that this life insurance company could do its business with 7,000 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. And the gentleman says this life insurance company can do the amount of business that the War Risk Insurance Bureau is doing with 7,400 clerks, when the statistics show that that bureau is doing it with 2,400 clerks.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The only difference between the gentleman from Texas and myself is that he is distinguishing the insurance end of this business from the other divisions of it.

Mr. RAYBURN. What has the New York Life to do with it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am talking not only about the New York Life, but also the New York Mutual and the New York Prudential.

Mr. RAYBURN. All the insurance companies in the United States have not got as much insurance in force as the Bureau of War Risk Insurance has. Has the gentleman counted it up to see how many men the life insurance companies have to transact their business?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. RAYBURN. I say the Bureau of War Risk Insurance has 2,400 clerks, and it has more insurance in force than all the private companies in America. Has the gentleman gone into the question to see how many employees the private insurance companies of the United States have?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am giving the gentleman the figures as given to me by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, of the employees who handle the total business of that bureau.

Mr. RAYBURN. But the gentleman surely does not want to convey the impression that those 14,000 clerks are all in the insurance section of the War Risk Bureau?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I did not say so.

Mr. RAYBURN. I should hope the gentleman would not want to convey that impression.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What I have said is that there are 4,000,000 policyholders of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Now, as a large amount of this work that is being done by the War Risk Insurance Bureau relates to allotments, there is a comparatively small amount of work to be done——

Mr. RAYBURN. By whom?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. By the bureau.

Mr. RAYBURN. By what division of it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The bureau itself. What I mean is that the bureau handles its work through these employees, and I do not know how they are divided.

Mr. RAYBURN. It has two or three million allotments which have to be handled each month.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman from Texas is taking a good deal of my time, but I want to answer him, if I can.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman does not want to put himself in a false light.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am not going to do so, and I do not propose to let the gentleman do it.

Mr. RAYBURN. To my mind the gentleman was creating a false impression, and I am sure he does not intend to do that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not think so. I have contended that there are these 4,000,000 policyholders of the Government, whose work is being handled by 14,000 employees, and I have said, or tried to say, that the work that is being done as to these various policies is not any greater in the aggregate than is being done, for instance, by the Prudential Life Insurance Co. as to its various types of policyholders, some of whom have annuities, some of whose collections are taken monthly, and the bulk of whose business differs very much from that of a straight insurance company. And I believe that the Prudential Life Insurance Co., or some other company doing a regular life-insurance business, could do this business much more economically and efficiently than it is now being done by our War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas if he thinks the amount of insurance in force is a fair measure of comparison, when the War Risk Insurance policies are largely for $10,000 each, a very large amount, as insurance policies go? Practically the same amount of work has to be done on a small industrial policy as on a large policy. On the other hand, has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that a large number of the employees of the Prudential, for instance, are solicitors for the business of that company, whereas in this Government insurance there is no occasion for soliciting?

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman says that these war-risk insurance policies are for $10,000. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that most of the insurance premiums in the United States are paid annually, whereas these war-risk insurance premiums are paid monthly.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; but the war-risk premiums do not have to be collected by solicitors.

Mr. RAYBURN. If you will divide each of these $10,000 policies by 12, it will give a fairer comparison of the relative amount of business.

Mr. EMERSON. The Prudential Insurance Co. collects weekly.

Mr. TILSON. Weekly or monthly——

Mr. RAYBURN. On all of its policies?

Mr. TILSON. Whereas the collections on the war-risk insurance policies are made from the pay rolls of the soldiers.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman say that all the premiums of the Prudential Insurance Co. are collected weekly?

Mr. TILSON. Premiums for industrial insurance, which constitutes a very large portion of the total number of policies of the Prudential Insurance Co., are usually collected weekly or monthly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Here is what I am trying to get at. I have already called attention to the great disproportion in the number of employees in this governmental bureau, as compared with the number engaged in other insurance work, and the thing I want to suggest to the members of this committee is whether this Congress is willing now to embark upon the insurance business or whether we want to encourage that sort of a proposition. I am entirely willing and glad to have the Government carry the insurance of these soldiers and sailors who come back who can not get insurance elsewhere. I think that is the thing for us to do. I am also glad to embark upon any scheme that will carry their insurance for a reasonable time, until it can be transferred to other agencies that can carry it; but I do not believe it is wise or practicable or good economics for us now to start upon the idea of a Government insurance company.

Mr. EMERSON. If this War Risk Insurance Bureau is abolished, what becomes of the men who have been injured in the war? How will they be taken care of? I want to get the gentleman's idea about that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The men who are injured ought to be continued as insurable risks by the Government, because there is no other place for them to get their insurance. We pledged them that before we went to war.

Mr. EMERSON. I think that is right.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. We want to make good our pledge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this statement in response to the gentleman and in explanation of this appropriation. This appropriation is $1,378,000 less than the estimate submitted and $181,370 less than the amount appropriated for the current year. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] has assumed in his remarks that practically all of the employees in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance are engaged in the insurance work. As a matter of fact, only about one-fourth, or less than one-fourth, of the employees at the present time are engaged in the insurance division of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What makes the gentleman think that I assume that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is what I understood the gentleman to say in his comparison of the number of employees here at the War Risk Insurance Bureau with the number of employees in the various insurance companies.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman misunderstood me; I did not so state at any time. In fact, I expressly disavowed that. I stated the number of men employed by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and then I went on to develop the theory that this work they were doing in respect to these millions of policyholders was no greater in amount than was being done by the insurance companies. I did not intend to say, nor do I intend to say, that they are entirely in the insurance work.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not want to misquote the gentleman, but I understood the gentleman to say that by comparison with the insurance company to which he referred this work ought to be done with 7,000 employees here in the insurance division. As a matter of fact only 2,400 are so employed. I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact. Here are 4,000,000 policyholders. Twelve notices have to be sent out each year to each policyholder, one each month, and then the War Risk Bureau here collects the premium 12 times from each policyholder. If the policyholder fails to remit promptly, he is sent a second notice within 60 days, and then if he fails to remit he is sent another notice requiring in this notice that he shall furnish an affidavit as to his physical condition; and if I remember correctly, he is then sent still another notice before he is dropped from the rolls, because the policy does not lapse for six months after default.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the War Risk Insurance Bureau require these soldiers to personally remit each month?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is taken out of the pay of the soldier at the present time.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman said they had to send a notice each month to each soldier and get the remittance from the soldier.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was speaking with reference to the next fiscal year, for this appropriation applies to the next fiscal year, and at that time it is to be hoped that most of these men will have been discharged and will be in the civilian positions.

Mr. MANN. I hope so.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We all understand that as long as the soldier is in the Army or the Navy his premium is deducted from his pay, unless he has requested otherwise.

Mr. MANN. What use have they for 2,400 or 400 employees to do that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have just stated to the gentleman that these payments come in monthly. There are 4,000,000 of them. They necessarily require a great number of clerks to keep the audit and keep the record of these payments made by these soldiers and sailors.

The fact that they have 2,400 employees now does not mean that they are not going to need more during the next fiscal year, because necessarily that division will have to be increased to a considerable extent for the reasons I have just stated. In addition to that, under the law each soldier has a right to convert his policy whenever he chooses, and it is expected that a great many of these conversions will be requested and will take place during the next fiscal year. Examinations have to be made, investigations have to be made from time to time, and in addition to that there are quite a number of these employees in the War Risk Bureau who are employed in the allotment and allowance section. Of course that is going to be largely decreased, I hope, by July 1, but nevertheless there will be required a considerable number of employees during a portion of the next fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman lands himself in this position, as far as this appropriation is concerned. He says that it requires no considerable clerical work to take care of the payments in the insurance part of it now, because that is a deduction from pay, but he says that will be decreased because men are discharged from the Army, and when they are discharged there are no further allotments and allowances to be taken care of. My colleague from Illinois called attention to the fact that you propose to appropriate, and, in fact, have a force down there of 14,000 people employed under this department, and that while the people are in the Army the war-risk insurance, as insurance, amounts to but little, and that after they are out of the Army the allowance and allotment will amount to nothing.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman was incorrect in his statement that there will be 14,000 employees, because the War Risk Bureau only estimates for the next fiscal year 9,101 employees, and the committee cut their estimate $1,378,000.

Mr. MANN. How much less is the appropriation next year than it is for the present year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. $181,370.

Mr. MANN. Less next year than in the current year; and you propose to reduce the clerical force from 14,000 to how many?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the gentleman overlooks the fact that while it is $181,370 less than the appropriation for the current year, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is asking for a deficiency for the remainder of this fiscal year to take care of these employees. They estimate for only 9,101 employees for the next fiscal year. The committee has cut their estimate $1,378,000, which applies not only to employees but to the work of investigation.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not know how many employees they need or how many they have, but I am in favor of giving them all that they ask for, because I think they are the ones to be held responsible. They are not attending to the insurance business properly; they are not attending to the allowance business properly; and they are not attending to the allotment business properly.

There is not one of these branches where the work is up to date or where any satisfaction can be obtained from the bureau in reference to any individual case.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction with the bureau. I certainly hold no brief for the bureau, because I have had a number of cases myself of which I have made serious complaint, but I am satisfied that the present director of the bureau, who comes very highly——

Mr. MANN. Talks good; but does he do anything?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He has not had an opportunity to show the gentleman and other Members of Congress just what he will do, but those who know him are satisfied that he is going to make good.

Mr. MANN. I received the same letter from him this morning that every Member of Congress did, asking when we had any complaints to make that we address it to him personally. Thereupon I wrote him a letter. I do not expect it would receive any attention at all if I did not make this remark. Now, I expect it will, but the other letters which will not be sent to him—I have scores of them—will not receive the attention of the War Risk Bureau. They are not attending to anything down there and have not been since he has been in, as far as my observation and experience goes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He has only been in a week or so.

Mr. FOSTER. He has been in less than 30 days.

Mr. MANN. Thirty days is time to do something with 10,000——

Mr. FOSTER. He is doing something.

Mr. MANN. I will not say he is not, but it is being done for the Democratic side of the House; we have not observed any over here. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] gets things done, but I can not get such things done.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman complained of Brown to-day, and he is a Republican, not a Democrat.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois raises the question of what these employees who are now in the insurance division are doing. I want to read this, which will show just what kind of work they are accomplishing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (reading)—

Up to this time, these employees have been engaged chiefly in the preparation of the records of insurance taken by the four and a quarter million men in the Army and in the Navy who have applied for insurance. Indexes and premium-card records have been prepared and insurance certificates have been issued. While the men have been in the service the premiums, amounting now to about $24,000,000 a month, have been collected by the pay officers of the Army and Navy. With the return of the men to civil life, the collection of the premiums will have to be made by the insurance division, and this will mean mailing a premium notice each month to every man after his discharge if he continues his insurance, and recording the premium if he pays it, as well as sending follow-up notices to all persons who become delinquent in the payment of their premiums. An insurance policy will have to be issued in every case where the insured elects to change from the present term insurance to a standard form of policy. This work of conversion, of course, will not all be done in the fiscal year of 1920, but must be begun during the year and must be finished within five years from the termination of the war. It is safe to assume that for a long time to come there can be no reduction in the number of persons employed in the insurance division. On the other hand, it is probable that, even with the introduction of the best labor-saving devices available, some increase in the force will be necessary.

In making this recommendation for over $10,000,000 the committee was actuated by this purpose and this purpose alone. We wanted to give this Bureau of War Risk Insurance all the money that was necessary to do this work properly, so that it could not be said that they did not have sufficient employees to do the work of that bureau.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. How many buildings is that bureau occupying at the present time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are occupying at the present time 15 buildings, and that has been offered as one of the reasons for the failure to promptly settle all cases.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman expect them to move into the Arlington Building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill provides that they shall have a place in that building as soon as completed.

Mr. WALSH. How soon will that building be completed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The building, I understand, will be completed by February 1, or at least the main building. The annex will be completed some months later.

Mr. WALSH. Will that go a great ways toward relieving this opportunity for criticism?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for a few minutes—two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman please explain how long the Government will carry these policies of $10,000 that are now held by soldiers after they are discharged?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The soldiers may convert their policies at any time for five years after their discharge.

Mr. RAYBURN. They are carried as long as the man lives.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What are they going to be converted into that requires the consent of some insurance company?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, no. In the document room the gentleman can find a copy of the law. It does not require that they be converted with the consent of an insurance company. The Government carries the insurance under the law that was passed as long as the man lives.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what I wanted to find out—if they had that right. What is the rate? Is there an increase of the rate, or is it at the same rate?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The mortality tables—3½ per cent—with which the gentleman is perfectly familiar.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee for just a moment or two. These three divisions in the War Risk Insurance Bureau—compensation, allowance, and insurance—will not be perpetual, of course. The allotment and allowance divisions will stop as soon as the close of the war is officially announced.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As soon as the soldiers are discharged.

Mr. FESS. The compensation division might be taken care of by the Pension Department if Congress saw proper to transfer it. That would leave the insurance division a permanent bureau. My question, and it is in the best of faith, is: In the opinion of the chairman, what will be the number of men and women to take care of the insurance feature alone? Has the gentleman any figures on that at all?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have not; and those appearing for the bureau at the hearings could not state definitely. All they could say was that it was going to require quite an increase over the present number of employees, growing out of the necessity of sending these notices and follow-up notices to which I have referred.

Mr. FESS. It will be an increase rather than a decrease?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It will be increased considerably.

Mr. FESS. As the gentleman knows, it is so difficult to detach anyone from the Government service that there will be all sorts of arguments that this person or that person should be retained, and it seems to me that is a fact we ought to consider pretty minutely.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I did not mean that the gentleman should understand me as saying that there would not subsequently be a decrease, but I was referring to the fiscal year 1920. There will be a considerable increase of employees required during that year, and perhaps the next year, until these policies are all converted. After that, in all probability, the force can be reduced to a considerable extent.

Mr. FESS. My correspondence, as I am sure the gentleman's does, pertains much as to the allowance features. Mr. Lindsley frankly said before the Rules Committee that the War Risk Insurance Bureau had not very well functioned, admitted there was a lot of irregularity, and promised the committee there would be a reorganization, with the assurance that there would be better results. That is one reason why the committee felt that the new director should have plenty of time to indicate what reforms could be worked.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a statement right there that has not been made on the floor, and which I think should be made in justice to the former heads of the bureau? It was stated to the committee that the work in the allotment and allowance section, the sending out of the checks, was greatly delayed during the "flu" epidemic here in the city of Washington. A great percentage of the employees were away from the bureau for a considerable number of days. Then, in addition to that, they installed some addressograph machines in the bureau for addressing these checks, and the plates were defective; and owing to the great difficulty in securing material and getting competent expert men to do that work they were unable to supply those plates for a considerable length of time. Those things militated considerably against the prompt handling of the checks for allotments and allowances. The gentleman no doubt received a number of letters, as I did and as all Members of the House did, complaining that checks were two or three months behind during the fall. And that was the explanation given for this delay.

Mr. FESS. There was an immense amount of confusion in that section, as the gentleman knows. Checks were sent out that would be irregular and would have to be returned. And that would indicate there is quite a large force in the allotment and allowance section, and when that discontinues there ought to be a great reduction in the number of employees in this bureau.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is all contemplated, and they will be considerably reduced during the next fiscal year. But those employees will be taken up in the increase necessary in the compensation division and insurance division.

Mr. FESS. So that with the discontinuance of the second section, we will not reduce the number of employees in the bureau materially?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, yes; because there are now about 13,000 employees in these three different classes in the bureau. The estimates submitted only contemplated a little over 9,000 employees for the next fiscal year.

Mr. FESS. That would indicate that about 5,000 are taken out of this second section?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not particularly that section, but it indicated that they were going to drop or expected to drop during the next fiscal year at least 4,000 employees.

Mr. FESS. I think the committee has quite a task on its hands in reducing the number of employees. I was lately talking with a man that had 300 men under him, and he said that he could get along with 30. I think such an error as that ought to be corrected, and I think if it was brought to the attention of the committee it would be corrected. The reason I have risen is not to attack the number but to indicate the difficulty of detaching from the roll any person when once put upon the roll. It seems to me we have got to use the knife somewhere.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am frank to say that there is necessarily a great deal of uncertainty as to how many employees will be needed during the next fiscal year. Now, we did not have the advantage and opportunity of hearing the new director, because these hearings were held before he was appointed. But we felt we ought to be certain to allow a sufficient number so that there could not be any complaint during the next fiscal year concerning delays.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio have two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I notice the gentleman says 13,000 employees. Does not he agree with me that the number now is approximately 14,500, or does the gentleman have any accurate information as to the situation to-day?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The director of the bureau, if the gentleman will yield further, gave me these figures this morning, giving 14,403 employees in the contract piece roll and the permanent and temporary rolls. Does the gentleman think that during the next fiscal year those employees that are engaged there will be increased or decreased?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They will be greatly decreased; necessarily so. As the Army demobilizes these employees will be decreased in number.

Now, the gentleman asked me as to the number of employees. Mr. Brown was asked—

Mr. Brown, how many employees are in the bureau at this time?

He replied:

We have approximately 13,000, including the permanent, temporary, and contract employees.

That is where I get my information.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The statement I have given was given me this morning. It was given by the telephone, but the person who gave it purported to be the director of the bureau, and I presume he was. He gave me those figures exactly as I have given them here.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This statement I have quoted was made on December 13.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to disagree with this notion that the number of employees in this establishment will be decreased next year or the year following. Sight is lost of the fact that very few of the men who have gone into this war, the 4,000,000, have yet made application for pension. In the war-risk insurance law it is called "compensation." While you may get reduction of the allotment and allowance features, here comes the pension feature of the war-risk insurance act under title 3. Most of the soldiers will then be out of service, and it will not be easy then to collect these premiums, as it is now, by deducting from the pay of the soldiers. They will have to be notified. They can not be dropped out abruptly, and it will require more time in the collection of premiums and in the conversion of this great amount of life insurance into other forms and policies under the law, as contemplated.

So in my opinion it will be a long time, just as it has been in the Pension Bureau a number of years, before this force can be reduced; that is, if the force now employed is working efficiently. Necessarily for a number of years the force will have to be increased in the War Insurance Bureau rather than decreased.

I am one of the Members of Congress who opposed at the time of the passage of this law the taking away from the Pension Bureau of the business that properly belonged to that bureau and placing it in the War Risk Insurance Bureau. It seems to me that subsequent events have justified the wisdom of the contention of those who were opposed to ignoring the two pension committees of this House, when merely because the Secretary of the Treasury, who was then seeking work and seemed to be wanting other jobs, inasmuch as appointments did not come fast enough, issued a command to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to reach into the Department of the Interior and take away from that department work that properly belonged to the Bureau of Pensions and placed it under the War Risk Insurance Bureau. The Secretary of the Treasury, through the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reached into the War and Navy Departments and took away work that properly belonged to those departments and put it into the War Risk Insurance Bureau and concentrated all of this work under one head. I take it that the Secretary of the Treasury thought it would be popular then to be the head of this great bureau which was being created, but it seems since all this trouble has developed that he has taken a sudden action to resign and go West.

Now, gentlemen, I refer you to the bill that has been introduced here by a Representative from Illinois, Mr. FULLER, who in a speech made last Saturday stated what I have no doubt is true, that all of the work that is being done and that will be done in the War Risk Insurance Bureau by reason of the passage of title 3 of the war-risk insurance act, the pension part of it, could all be done in the Pension Bureau practically by the force that is now employed there. If that is true, why not take away from the War Risk Insurance Bureau this work that should not have been given to it and transfer it to the Pension Bureau? Will it not save a great deal of money?

Mr. RAYBURN. How do you know that?

Mr. SWITZER. Here is a bureau whose machinery has been built up during the past 55 years.

Mr. RAYBURN. How do you know it would save money?

Mr. SWITZER. I have the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER], who is on the Committee on Invalid Pensions. You can read his speech. I have no doubt the Pension Bureau could take care of all the pension work that is being done to-day in the War Risk Insurance Bureau if that work were placed in the Pension Bureau.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, the Pension Office has been behind ever since I have been in Congress with the little work it has to do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman know that the Pension Bureau has been complaining to the Committee on Appropriations of the very fact that there was inserted in the bill a couple of years ago a provision preventing them from increasing their force and complaining that with their present force they have been unable to do their work?

Mr. SWITZER. Of course, there is no bureau that wants to drop any of its force. I understand that.

It has been stated here in this debate that we have been exceedingly liberal to the soldiers in the way of pensions. The great trouble in this Congress, I think, has been that we have stressed too much the importance of the insurance feature. I find that scarcely half of the soldiers, even after they get home from their service, know that they are entitled to a pension if they have been crippled or have received an injury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have just two or three minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWITZER. For some reason or other the matter of insurance has been impressed upon the minds of the soldiers, but nothing has been said to them about their right to have a pension if they become crippled or diseased.

Mr. RAYBURN. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SWITZER. Very well.

Mr. RAYBURN. Neither the soldier nor any of his people has any claim on this compensation unless he is crippled. They have no interest it it unless he is hurt.

Mr. SWITZER. What I want to impress upon the members of this committee is that at this time, on account of this propaganda emphasizing the war-insurance feature, which has overshadowed everything else, neither the soldiers nor their families are aware of the fact that they are entitled to a pension. Their families seem to know nothing about it until long after they have received notice of the soldier's death. Now, it has been stated that we have been more liberal than any other Congress. I do not understand that we have been more liberal for these crippled and maimed soldiers. I believe there was an amendment made to the law offered by me giving a soldier who lost both hands, both feet, or both eyes $100 a month, the same as they received under the pension law that has been on the books for at least a decade. Now, as I understand it, for a total disability, under this law only $30 can be paid. What is the rating of the War Risk Insurance Bureau on a man who has lost an arm or a hand or a leg? Can the gentleman tell me? It could not be over $30 a month. And yet when the first million men enlisted or were drafted the law was this: For the loss of one hand or one foot, or being totally disabled in the same, the rate was $40 per month; for the loss of an arm at or below the elbow or a leg at or above the knee, or being totally disabled in the same, the rate was $46 per month; for the loss of an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint, or where the same is in such a condition as to warrant the use of an artificial limb, the rate was $55 per month; for the loss of one hand and one foot, or being totally disabled in the same, the rate was $60 per month.

Now, in the pension law, at the time the first million men were enlisted or drafted, this was the rate of compensation to be paid for those specified losses. Yet, day by day we hear statements here that we have been more liberal to the maimed and disabled soldiers than past Congresses or other countries, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Auditing accounts of the Army in France: For salaries of employees in the offices of the Comptroller of the Treasury and Auditor for the War Department to audit accounts arising in connection with the Military Establishment abroad, including traveling expenses, per diem not exceeding $4 in lieu of subsistence for officers and employees absent from Washington, rent abroad, cablegrams and telegrams, printing, stationery, office equipment and exchange thereof, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $375,000, of which not exceeding $75,000 may be expended in closing up during the fiscal year 1920 the work abroad now performed pursuant to the authority for auditing accounts abroad contained in section 12 of the act of September 24, 1917.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question about this item at the bottom of page 44, for the offices of the Comptroller of the Treasury: How many auditors are there in France under this section? When I was going across to the other side this fall there were 14 auditors on the ship that I sailed on, who said they were engaged in this kind of work, and I would like to know how many men there are doing this sort of work over there.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. About 175 in Paris now, I understand.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. One hundred and seventy-five?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Those men are engaged in checking the vouchers that pass between the Treasury and the War Department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are there for the purpose of auditing the accounts of the War Department for supplies and other expenditures made in France.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know about what their average salary is?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; I do. Their salaries are placed at different amounts. Under the Comptroller of the Treasury there is an assistant comptroller, at $4,500; one chief clerk, at $300 per month; one expert accountant, at $250 per month; two expert accountants, at $200 per month each; one clerk, at $160 per month; one clerk, at $140 per month; two clerks, at $110 per month.

Then, there are 165 persons employed in the office of the Assistant Auditor for the War Department at Paris, at follows: One assistant auditor, $4,000; 1 chief clerk, at $250 per month; 1 expert accountant, at $250 per month; 1 clerk, at $200 per month; 1 clerk, at $160 per month; 9 clerks, at $150 per month; 20 clerks, at $135 per month; 78 clerks, at $125 per month; 25 clerks, at $110 per month; and 28 clerks, at $100 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR NAVY DEPARTMENT: Auditor, $4,000; chief clerk and chief of division, $2,250; law clerk, $2,000; 2 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 2 assistant chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; clerks—27 of class 4, 45 of class 3, 45 of class 2, 65 of class 1, 35 at $1,000 each, 7 at $900 each; helper, $900; messenger; 2 assistant messengers; 3 laborers; messenger boy, $480; in all, $324,790.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the desire of the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge as to running this evening?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that we were disappointed about not being able to meet at 11 o'clock this morning, and, as we have not made much headway, I had hoped we might be able to run at least until 7 o'clock.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it be agreeable to the gentleman to move to rise at 6.30, with the understanding that we will try to have an agreement that we may meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; if I can not do any better than that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am informed that the gentleman stated that he would do even better than that under compulsion.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Treasurer: Treasurer, $8,000; Assistant Treasurer, $3,600; Deputy Assistant Treasurer, $3,200; cashier, $3,600; assistant cashier, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500; chiefs of divisions—2 at $3,000 each, 3 at $2,500 each; 3 assistant chiefs of divisions, at $2,250 each; vault clerk, $2,500; principal bookkeeper, $2,500; 2 tellers, at $2,500 each; assistant tellers—2 at $2,250 each, 3 at $2,000 each; 5 section chiefs, at $2,000 each; assistant bookkeepers—2 at $2,100 each, 2 at $2,000 each; interest teller, $2,000; vault clerk, bond division, $2,000; clerk for Treasurer, $1,800; coin clerk, $1,400; clerks—25 of class 4, 28 of class 3, 8 at $1,500 each, 32 of class 2, 8 at $1,300 each, 115 of class 1, 85 at $1,000 each, 45 at $900 each; expert counters—40 at $1,200 each, 10 at $1,100 each, 44 at $1,000 each, 90 at $900 each, 12 at $800 each, 26 at $720 each; 2 compositors and pressmen, at $1,600 each; addressograph operator, $1,400; 2 skilled laborers, at $1,200 each; silver piler, $1,000 and $200 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent; 14 messengers; 8 assistant messengers; 23 laborers; messenber boys—8 at $600 each, 14 at $480 each, 8 at $360 each; in all, $778,170.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask about the language in line 22—"and $200 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent."

I assume there is some reason for that, and I would like to know what it is.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is a reason for it. That is on account of the very great efficiency of a silver piler who has been employed in the Treasurer's office, for many, many years. It has been stated to the committee that he is a Swede, a man of very powerful build, who has worked very faithfully and efficiently for a number of years in that office.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. This has been customary heretofore?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has been carried for the last two or three years.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Commissioner, $6,500; deputy commissioners—2 at $4,000 each, 1 $3,600; chemists—chief $3,000, 1 $2,500; assistant chemists—2 at $1,800 each, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400; heads of divisions—1 $3,500, 5 at $2,500 each, 5 at $2,250 each; 3 assistant heads of divisions, at $2,000 each; attorney, $3,600; law clerk, $2,000; insurance expert, $2,000; railroad expert, $2,000; superintendent of stamp vault, $2,000; private secretary, $1,800; clerks—4 at $2,000 each, 52 of class 4, 60 of class 3, 98 of class 2, 83 of class 1, 76 at $1,000 each, 73 at $900 each; 11 messengers; 21 assistant messengers; 16 laborers; in all, $687,870.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the reading of this paragraph suggests to me that this office will be, probably during the next fiscal year, somewhat modified perhaps by that which has occurred to-day. Nebraska, of which I represent one district, is the thirty-sixth State to ratify the amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as the prohibition amendment. Nebraska was the thirty-seventh State to enter this Union. Modest as it has always been, it did not desire to be the first to ratify it, but when it came to carrying any procedure of this kind over the top I am pleased to say that Nebraska did the turn.

Mr. GALLAGHER. What are they going to do with their corn out there?

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, Chicago men, I understand, have cultivated a great taste for johnnycakes, even above that for potatoes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I think it will take a long time before johnnycake will satisfy them.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For stationery, including tags, labels, and index cards printed in course of manufacture, for the Treasury Department and its several bureaus and offices, $90,000, and in addition thereto sums amounting to $216,400 shall be deducted from other appropriations made for the fiscal year 1920, as follows: Contingent expenses, Independent Treasury, $5,000; contingent expenses, mint at Philadelphia, $700; contingent expenses, mint at San Francisco, $300; contingent expenses, mint at Denver, $300; contingent expenses, assay office at New York, $700; materials and miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, $11,000; suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes, $700; Public Health Service, $3,500; Quarantine Service, $1,000; preventing the spread of epidemic diseases, $500; expenses of Coast Guard, $5,000; general expenses of public buildings, $6,000; collecting the revenue from customs, $66,700; collecting war revenue, $115,000; and said sums so deducted shall be credited to and constitute, together with the first-named sum of $90,000, the total appropriation for stationery for the Treasury Department and its several bureaus and offices, with the exception of field officers located in foreign countries, for the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry. In line 15, page 55, I find the following language: "General expenses of public buildings, $6,000." What is the reason for that item?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is a transfer of an appropriation so that the stationery can be purchased through the bureau of printing and stationery in the Treasury Department. In other words, this paragraph here represents transfers from the various funds belonging to different Government activities in the department. The transfer is made in order that these purchases may be made through one central agency, the division of stationery and printing.

Mr. FESS. What I had in mind was whether there is not some overlapping here between one committee and another. There are so many items that it seems should not appear in this bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is a transfer from the appropriation that is made in the sundry civil appropriation bill for public buildings. This does not carry any additional appropriation, but simply transfers this amount of money, $6,000, from the appropriation carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill, so that the supplies necessary may be purchased through this central agency.

Mr. FESS. There is no duplication?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. None whatever.

The Clerk read as follows:

For operating expenses of the Treasury Department Annex, including fuel, electric current, ice, ash removal, repairs, and miscellaneous items, $15,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is this item for operating expenses of the Treasury Department Annex, for the new building in course of construction on Pennsylvania Avenue next to the Belasco Theater?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. How did they compute the amount required for operating expenses on a building at this stage of its completion?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They take into consideration the number of square feet in the building, the number of rooms, and they figure on the amount of coal and electric current that will be necessary for the entire fiscal year, basing their estimates upon what is being consumed and has been consumed in buildings of similar size.

Mr. WALSH. Are there any additional employees provided for to go into that building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; but they are in a previous paragraph of the bill. This does not relate to any employees.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know when that building is to be completed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not say to the gentleman definitely.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, it is stated by the supervising architect——

Mr. WALSH. We have not any supervising architect.

Mr. STAFFORD. Or the gentleman acting in that capacity, that they expected to have the building ready for completion about April or May 1 of this year. It is all under roof.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly prior to the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. WALSH. What department of the Treasury is to be in that building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That has not been determined, so far as I have understood. I think it was originally intended that the Internal Revenue Service would go into that building. Whether that bureau will be actually placed in that building I do not know. I have heard different stories as to what bureaus are going in there.

Mr. WALSH. Would it not make a difference in the operating expenses of the building what department would go in there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think it would not, because they will all require the same amount of heat and the same amount of electricity and the same amount of ice.

Mr. WALSH. And this is based upon the entire year, so that it is expected that in the future they will be able to operate that annex building for $15,000 annually?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Their estimate was somewhat larger than this. I am reminded by the clerk that it was about $19,000, and the committee reduced it to $15,000, thinking that would be enough.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of cards and tabulating equipment for use in auditing accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service, including exchange and repairs, $219,000, to be expended under the direction of the Auditor for the Post Office Department under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That not exceeding $39,400 may be expended for the rental of tabulating and card-sorting machines.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 14078 had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. LITTLEPAGE was granted leave of absence for one week on account of illness in the family.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SLOAN. For leave to revise and extend the speeches I made to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his speeches made to-day. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 17, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERNALD. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Bangor, Me., urging the protection of the rights of investors in public utilities, and the further development and utilization of the water powers of the State of Maine, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BANGOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Bangor, Me., January 15, 1919.

Hon. BERT M. FERNALD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find copy of letter, together with resolutions adopted by our chamber here. We shall be obliged if you will give these any publicity you can; also, if you will urge the National Chamber of Commerce to give what notice they can to them.

Yours, very truly,

JAMES Q. GULNAC, President.

BANGOR, ME., January 8, 1919.

SIRS: The Bangor Chamber of Commerce, in sending to you a copy of resolutions passed by them, beseech you to give immediate consideration of these questions. They also ask you to consider that future developments in the State of Maine are almost wholly dependent upon the development and utilization of the water powers of the State; that to make possible the full use of the present water developments and to justify further electric developments a proper consideration must be granted the investing public by the powers regulating such development and operation; that our governor, our legislature, our public utility commission be urged to consider the fact that for any well-regulated public utility it is their sworn duty to see that the rights of the investing public are properly safeguarded, and that for such well-regulated utility a return upon their investment sufficient to attract capital inside the State and from outside the State is justified; that the majority of citizens desire to see the resources of the State fully developed. May we ask you also to make known to us the result of any investigation you may make, to the end that a full education of the public in this question be obtained?

Respectfully,

BANGOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
———— ————, President.

Resolutions adopted by the Bangor Chamber of Commerce.

Whereas the Bangor Chamber of Commerce feels that the country is facing a grave condition in regard to public utilities; and

Whereas they feel that all citizens are vitally interested in the well-being of the public utilities; and

Whereas they feel that on their organization and on similar organizations throughout this entire country rests a grave responsibility in this regard: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Bangor Chamber of Commerce, realizing that their duty was to study the question, both in the State of Maine and elsewhere, and to make known to their members and to the citizens of this community the result of their study—

That as a result of such study the Bangor Chamber of Commerce finds that a substantial part of the funds of the savings banks is invested in bonds of public utilities; that the depositors of mutual savings banks are in reality part owners of every such investment; that the same is true of the life insurance companies, both as to investment and ownership; that the present and future well-being of every community is directly dependent upon the successful running and further development of the public utilities operating in their locality; that every such community should be anxious to see that the conditions under which such public utilities are operating are such as to allow the companies sufficient revenue to properly protect the public from accidents, to keep their lines in good condition, to render efficient service to the public, to make further needed developments, and to safeguard the property ownership of the investing public.

The Bangor Chamber of Commerce feels that a much graver responsibility rests with the public-service commissions; that their sworn duty is to see that the public utilities are properly and efficiently run; that they are responsible for the credit, continuity, and general well-being of the public utilities; that every public-service commission should be upheld and backed where they have recognized such responsibility; that where commissions have not so recognized this duty the public should insist that they so do.

The Bangor Chamber of Commerce urges every board of trade in the State of Maine to at once start a study of this question; that they urge the National Chamber of Commerce at Washington to give space in The Nation's Business to this question; that the National Chamber of Commerce be asked to urge every member of the national association to study this question and to make known through publicity in the same channels the result of this study.

The Bangor Chamber of Commerce also urges the Bangor Rotary Club to take this up with their national association in the same manner. The Bangor Chamber of Commerce feels that an intelligent study of this question by the business men of the country, with a campaign of publicity as to the result of this study, will aid greatly in solving rightly this very grave problem.

BANGOR, ME., January 6, 1919.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the City Council of Cambridge, Mass., favoring the establishment of a league of nations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition of the Political Study Club, of Orange, N. J., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Catholic Club of Bernardsville, N. J., praying for the freedom of Ireland, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Essex and Berger Counties, in the State of New Jersey, praying for the enactment of legislation substituting the oath required of enlisted men for the oath required of officers, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

STATE, WAR, AND NAVY BUILDING (S. DOC. NO. 344).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. From the Committee on Printing I present a report favorable to printing the report of the National Board of Fire Underwriters on the condition of the State, War, and Navy Building, transmitted by the Secretary of War in response to a resolution of the Senate, and I submit a resolution for that purpose. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the resolution lead to any debate?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It will lead to only a word or two. The junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] is interested in the subject and wishes to submit a few brief remarks. I will ask the Senator from New York if he proposes to take much time. If so, I will withdraw the resolution for the present.

Mr. CALDER. I will state that I shall take about five minutes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for this purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it ought to be read before consent is given.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will withdraw it if it is to lead to debate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the Senator wish to have the resolution read?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is in answer to a Senate resolution, recently passed, asking for information. The information came to the Senate, and under the rule it should be printed. I am asking that it be printed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If under the rule it should be printed, what is the necessity for the adoption of the resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I want to have the resolution passed to print the reports, together with the accompanying illustrations, which came in response to a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have the resolution read. That is all I want.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 413), as follows:

Resolved, That the reports of the National Board of Fire Underwriters on the condition of the State, War, and Navy Building, transmitted by the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the Senate (No. 271), be printed as a Senate document, together with the accompanying illustrations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the reports of the National Board of Fire Underwriters were sent to the Senate by the War Department, as the result of a resolution of inquiry submitted by me some months ago. I think it very important that the report should be printed, and I earnestly request Members of the Senate to read it carefully.

I was prompted to offer the resolution through observing that a frame structure had been built in one of the inner courts of the State, War, and Navy Building, which I considered to be a very real fire hazard to that building. It is a structure which ought not to be permitted in any public or private building in America, and for the past year it has been a very great menace to that fine structure.

The report will show that the most important papers of our Government are lodged in that building—the original Declaration of Independence, the original Constitution of the United States, our important treaties with foreign countries, and other valuable State, War, and Navy documents.

I have repeatedly urged, Mr. President, that this frame building should be demolished. Only yesterday, without knowledge that this matter would be brought up to-day, I called at the War Department and again urged that it be taken down. If it had been erected in the inner court of any private building in the United States it would have been ordered demolished long ago.

I hope, as the result of the printing of this report, some action will be taken by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this body, insisting that this building be put in proper condition to safeguard the valuable decuments of the country.

The resolution was passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. WEEKS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—S. J. BATCHELDER.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers accompanying the bill S. 1396, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, granting a pension to S. J. Batchelder, no adverse report having been made thereon.

UTILIZATION OF WINE GRAPES.

Mr. PHELAN. I offer a resolution and ask that it be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 414) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, requested to investigate and furnish the Senate of the United States with information bearing upon the utilization of wine grapes for other purposes than the production of alcoholic beverages.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays the unfinished business before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand that the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], has accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] to section 9; in other words, to strike out all of section 9 of the bill as it comes from the House and to insert a new section. To section 9 of the bill as it came from the House I offered an amendment placing the supervisors of the census under the civil-service act and rules. The acceptance of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland prevents my amendment from having any force whatever, and as the section now before the Senate, as introduced by the Senator from Maryland, provides that the supervisors of the census shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, it becomes necessary that I shall offer an amendment in conformity with the amendment which I offered while the bill was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. I realize that that can only be done by unanimous consent. I was not aware that section 9 of the bill, as it was accepted by the chairman of the committee, had any provision in it relating to the appointment of supervisors. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to offer the same amendment to section 9 as the bill provides now, as it is in the Senate, which I offered while the bill was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I hope the unanimous consent asked by the Senator from Utah may be granted, in order that we may have a vote on the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "appointed," on line 11 of the printed amendment of Mr. FRANCE, it is proposed to insert the words "in conformity with the civil-service act and rules."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, may I complete the amendment which I desire to offer, so that one vote will answer for the entire amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will state the remainder of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed, after the word "President," at the end of line 11 of the amendment of Mr. FRANCE, to insert the words "by and," so that it will read "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate"; and, after the word "Senate," on page 2, line 1, to insert the following proviso——

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, Mr. President, that I have modified the amendment in one respect, so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That said supervisors shall be selected from persons who have passed the necessary civil-service examinations.

That will complete my amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the pending question is not understood in the confusion in the Chamber. It has been impossible for any Senator to understand a word that has been said. Senators do not know what the question is, and I should like information before the call of the roll as to what we are to vote on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, which places the selection of these employees under the civil service. As the Chair understands, the same amendment was adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, but it was displaced by the adoption in the Committee of the Whole of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] substituting a new section for section 9.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as I understand, this amendment does not apply to all employees, but merely to supervisors.

Mr. SMOOT. It is merely as to supervisors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not hear what Senators are saying. Business will cease until order is restored in the Chamber. The Chair must ask Senators to take their seats and to cease conversation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Arizona that the amendment applies to the 400 supervisors who are provided for under the census bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Those 400 supervisors, as I understand, are to be called from the civil service?

Mr. SMOOT. They are to be appointed by the President from the persons who have passed the necessary civil-service examination.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No matter what branch of the civil service they happen to be in?

Mr. SMOOT. My amendment provides that they shall be selected from those who have passed the necessary civil-service examination, and, of course, the Civil Service Commission will provide the rules for the passing of the required examination.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. As I understand, then, the supervisors might be appointed from any branch of the civil service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], which I transfer to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I should like to inquire whether the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Montana has not voted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who, I notice, is not present. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—28.

PUBLICITY OF PEACE CONFERENCE PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I trust the Senator in charge of the census bill will pardon me for occupying the time of the Senate very briefly.

If the press reports from Versailles are correct, although I ought to say that all the press reports which come from that point begin by saying, "It is understood," or "It is supposed"—but if they be correct, the first point of the 14 points of the President is now up for consideration. I do not think that the Senate, a part of the treaty-making power, ought to permit it to pass without some consideration. I am perfectly aware that there are those who differ with me, but I regard it as one of the most vital propositions before the Congress, and we at least ought to permit it to be known that we are in full sympathy with the views of the American delegation with reference to publicity in the proceedings at Versailles.

I can not say, Mr. President, that it is a surprise that a movement has been inaugurated in favor of secrecy, and yet I had supposed from the announcements, not only in this country but in Europe, that more consideration would be given to the question than seems to have been given to it. It seems to have been disposed of without much discussion. I feel it is worthy of comment here.

When the President delivered his address to Congress upon the 8th of January, the first proposition looking to the permanent peace of the world read as follows:

Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

There can be no possible construction placed upon this language other than that it was intended to cover just such proceedings as are now being initiated at the peace conference.

Open covenants of peace—

Had the statement stopped there, it might be said that it was intended to cover the simple proposition of publishing the covenants of peace after they had been negotiated and concluded; but the President was careful to say:

Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at.

And the question now is whether or not that proposition is to be utterly discarded and disregarded in the proceedings at Versailles.

It would seem that they have practically concluded upon a program adverse to this proposition. I read a part of the article which appeared in yesterday's New York Times:

After all that has been promised concerning open discussion in the making of peace, steps were taken at to-day's session of the interallied conference which show that the whole intent is to keep the people of the world in the dark as to what is going on behind the closed doors of the Quai d'Orsay. The representatives of the five great powers adopted a resolution that nothing about their deliberation be disclosed except what was contained in the colorless daily communiqués.

Some of those connected with the conference construe the resolution as meaning that they are to be barred from seeing members of the press.

The whole spirit of the action taken is contrary in every respect to the assurances given to the American people, and already a feeling of discouragement and indignation is displayed among newspaper representatives from allied countries. The British correspondents made a formal protest, which was backed immediately by the American correspondents.

No disclosure has yet been made as to who was responsible for this amazing procedure, and I prefer to withhold a statement until I am more fully informed. The fact remains that the resolution must have been supported by the delegates of at least three powers, which shows how little the doctrine of open covenants, openly arrived at, prevails among those who are engaged in settling the destinies of the world.

Outside of this new and most serious cause for complaint the American correspondents feel that they are not getting a square deal in obtaining information from the American delegation. The daily conferences between the correspondents and members of the delegation are unproductive in every way, and the conclusion has been forced upon the correspondents that the only source of news concerning American participation in the peace negotiations is the President, who is inaccessible.

In spite of condemnation while the war was on of the secret methods prevailing at the Congress of Vienna, the conclusion is being forced upon observers here that this conference is the Congress of Vienna over again.

There is an Associated Press dispatch in this same paper, following that article, which I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PARIS, January 15, 1919.

The question of whether the peace conference is to be secret or wholly open to the eyes and ears of the world, the settlement of which has been long awaited, was brought to a focus to-day when it was announced that an agreement had been made to confine the information given to the public to a daily official communiqué and that a gentleman's agreement prevailed among the delegates not to discuss or in any way give information of the meetings in the foreign office.

No written official announcement of this purpose was issued, but word was passed out to this effect, and it was followed by an explosion which quite drowned out the doings of the peace commissioners.

The understanding is that the American and British delegates opposed this decision, but that the French, Italians, and Japanese, voting together, prevailed.

The British newspaper correspondents immediately joined in a memorial of protest, which they put before Premier Lloyd George. The American newspaper correspondents united in what is virtually a round robin to President Wilson, in which they protested in measured terms against the decision, and reminded the President of that one of his 14 points which specifies "open covenants of peace, openly arrived at."

The memorial was before the President to-night, and there is every reason to believe that such a storm has been raised as will force the question before the meeting again before the actual sessions of the peace conference begin on Saturday morning.

The question of whether the meetings are to be open or closed has been smoldering for several days. It is associated with conditions which have surrounded the lack of method in making public what has actually been going on in conference for the last month. The American newspaper correspondents, of whom there are about 100 here to report the peace proceedings, have been received in daily audience by the American commissioners under the stipulated conditions that what was developed was solely for their guidance and not to be reported as bearing the stamp of authority or coming from the mission.

The American delegates are indignant at what they regard as a breach of faith on the part of some persons who were admitted to the informal discussions they have been holding daily with newspaper men. These conferences were inaugurated immediately after the delegates arrived in Paris to keep correspondents properly advised of developments further than that given in official communiqués.

At the outset it was stipulated that nothing communicated to the correspondents during these conferences should be credited to official sources, the restriction being so severe as to prohibit the customary intimations as to sources, so that whatever a correspondent elected to write should be stated on his own responsibility.

Despite this a statement of informative character, made by Secretary of State Lansing to the newspaper men, appeared in some French newspapers, directly or indirectly attributed to him. It was made more embarrassing to the American delegates because the publications appeared in newspapers opposed to the present French Government.

Because some statements, used in this manner, related to subjects like the denial of the plan to use American troops in Poland, which is understood to be favored by the Clemenceau government, but is opposed by the Socialists, the American delegates felt they were in danger of being involuntarily dragged into the complications of French factional political conflicts.

At the request of the American delegation the correspondents have undertaken to adopt disciplinary measures and to require a separate understanding from each of their number to observe restrictions imposed regarding news use of matters discussed at these conferences in order to prevent further complications and, perhaps, the termination of the present confidential relations between the delegates and the newspaper men.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I observe by the press dispatches that the President has taken up this matter and that it may be reopened for consideration, and it is indicated in the press dispatches this morning that the ultimate result may be open sessions of the conference. It is by reason of this last item in the news that I felt disposed to say a word, because I should like to have the President know and to have the delegates representing this country at the conference know that the great majority of the American people expect that those proceedings shall be open and that all the details of substantial matters shall be made known as the congress proceeds in its deliberations.

Secret diplomacy has left the germ of conflict and of war in every great peace congress which has convened in the last 250 years. There has not been a single peace congress at which nations have met for the purpose of adjusting the troubles of any particular portion of the world but that there have been left for future contention, suspicion, prejudice, and feeling those things which resulted from secret negotiations and secret proceedings. If we are proposing to take a correct and accurate step toward permanent peace the people who fought and won this war must know the conditions upon which it is being settled. It will be a distinct discouragement, not only to the people of this country but, I venture to say, to the masses the world over, if at the first initiatory step the same old practice of absolute government is reinaugurated and readopted by a congress which comes together as a result of a fight to make the world safe for democracy.

I venture to read a paragraph from Lord Northcliffe, who, I presume, will not be considered as uninformed in regard to these matters or uninstructed as to the wisdom of the course proper here to be pursued. He says:

Nothing can be worse for the prospects of the coming conference than an atmosphere of secrecy and half truths. Yet up to the present there has been no official statement that the momentous meetings about to take place will be held in accordance with President Wilson's expressed views on the question of open diplomacy.

DAYS OF SECRET CONCLAVES GONE.

The days of secret conclaves are dead and gone. Clandestine assemblies are the harbingers of intrigue, suspicion, and possible deception. It would be intolerable that the fate of whole nations, great and small, should be decided in secret. Shall the destinies of millions of peoples in all quarters of the globe be left to the tender mercies of a comparative handful of delegates, against whose enactments there is no public appeal? Such would be mockery of that principle of self-determination of free nations which has been fought for and won in this war.

Labor, upon which the great losses of life during the war have mainly fallen, is alarmed at the prospect of great world plans being carried out without its knowledge. It is reported from London that the Labor Party has sent a strong protest to our Government, which so far has done nothing to allay public anxiety on the subject.

I ask leave also to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Public Ledger, Nov. 14, 1918.]

OPEN THE DOORS OF THE PEACE CONFERENCE—CEMENT THE PEOPLE'S VICTORY WITH A PEOPLE'S PEACE—WILL PRESIDENT WILSON GO?

There is not an American who does not understand that our victory has been won and the tragic price paid solely that "government of the people, for the people, by the people, shall not perish from the earth." Every American soldier dead in France laid down his life for that purpose, sustained and comforted by our tacit pledge that we would make very sure that his supreme sacrifice was not in vain. He died—the soldiers of our allies died—to substitute democracy for autocracy as mankind's dominant method of government.

Henceforth the people rule—that is that healing message, if we have not all been deceived, that the winged Victory of this electric age carried round the world like a swifter Ariel after the armistice was signed. All the wicked, blinding, betraying, tyrannous treacheries of autocracy were swept away by the allied guns. Sinister plottings, secret intrigues, back-stairs bribes, and double-dealing diplomacy with its soft voice and its serpent's heart, all the subterranean methods of autocracy, buying and selling peoples like cattle or sending them to the shambles for quarrels they neither shared nor comprehended—all are to vanish at the dawn of this new day like the miasma of a fetid swamp.

The peoples of the world are to rule as the peoples of these United States rule; and the corner stone of popular rule everywhere is free and public discussion.

Would we think we had popular rule in America if the sessions of Congress were habitually secret?

There are secret sessions of the Senate for the discussion of our foreign relations, which only means that, when even a democratic people must do business with Governments who traffic in secrecy, that people can not always play its hand, face up, on the table. But matters appertaining strictly to the government of the people of the United States are commonly discussed in public, and all important decisions are taken in public. We would never dream of tolerating any other system. The legislature of a free people can not be a secret society, with tiled doors and publicity prohibited.

Neither can the legislature of an association—a wider United States—of free peoples. Publicity is the very breath of life of popular government.

There will assemble in Europe presently a legislature of free peoples. None others are to be admitted. No autocracy need apply. It will be termed a peace conference, but its business will be to legislate regarding the most fundamental matters affecting the future happiness, security, and prosperity of practically all the free peoples of the world.

SHALL IT SIT BEHIND CLOSED DOORS?

If it does, what becomes of President Wilson's spirited, repeated, and perfectly proper protests against the ancient evil of "secret diplomacy"? This peace conference, remember, will not act for a number of autocratic governments, scornfully ignoring their own peoples, bartering away their rights and fixing their destinies behind their backs. It will act for the peoples themselves, and its every decision must be ratified by these peoples if it is to stand. For the first time in history a great treaty of peace, intimately touching many nations and remaking the maps of three continents, will be written by the plain people of the world and not by their irresponsible rulers, with their retinues of devious diplomats and professional political panderers.

It goes wholly without saying that such a peace conference should be wide open to its masters and creators, the ruling democracies whose decrees it will register. It should be as open as Congress, as the public courts, as most parliaments of self-governing nations. Every session should be open. All the debates and deliberations should be public. We should not only know what it does but why it does it. Still more important, we should know in advance what it thinks of doing, so that we can protest, agree, suggest changes.

The suggestion comes from Washington that President Wilson may attend in person this peace conference of unprecedented import and endless possibilities. It is a proposal which will have the unanimous support of the allied world, and would make a special appeal to the forward thinkers, the war-weary toilers, the passionate believers in democracy, everywhere. They would feel that their foremost champion was at the peace table. They would fear the insertion of no autocratic or militaristic "joker" in the conditions on which the permanent banishment of war is to be built. Americans will favor the idea most warmly if they can be assured that the vitally important business of their own Government can be arranged for in the absence of the Chief Executive. They will not take very seriously any sentimental tradition against the President leaving American territory during his term of office. Where our soldiers have died for liberty is "American territory" forever. This world-war into which we have been drawn has weakened the boundaries of precedent; and, as John Wesley put it, made "the world our province."

If President Wilson attends the conference, and possibly presides at its sessions on the invitation of all the allies, there will surely be no question about the "open door." That is one of his firmest, soundest principles. He will never consent to do the people's business in matters of such paramount importance out of the hearing of the peoples affected. He will never participate in and perpetuate by a commanding precedent that hoary evil which has sown suffering throughout humanity for a thousand years—"secret diplomacy."

Nor will the people of this free country permit it, if they have the power to prevent it. In this regard, they will be unanimously "behind the President." We hope the President will go. We hope that he will persuade this first peace conference of victorious democracy to deliberate, debate, and make its momentous decisions in full daylight.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is the same old story. When the Vienna Congress met, or was about to meet, there was the fullest assurance that the proceedings would be open to the world. There was the fullest assurance of the widest and most humanitarian consideration of all matters relating to the public ends. But scarcely had they met in that famous city when Metternich began to urge the necessity of secrecy in their negotiations; and, master of diplomacy as he was, he finally succeeded in closing the doors of the Vienna Congress to the outside world. Every student of history knows that inside those doors were written the secret treaties over which the world has been waging war from time to time ever since. It is not too much to ask, in view of the sacrifices which have been made and the tremendous results depending upon the action of this congress, that the world at large shall know its proceedings, and that the doors shall be open to all the world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am glad to hear words of commendation for the President of the United States in the hard fight that he is making in Europe. I am glad that at least one voice has gone up on the other side of this Chamber to hold up his hands instead of pulling them down. He has a hard fight to make, not only in behalf of the publicity of negotiations but in behalf of a great many other things as well.

I note with a great deal of pleasure that the Senator mentions the fact that the two great English-speaking peoples have announced themselves in favor of making public the steps of negotiation as they go on. Of course, that does not mean that every private conversation between two or three men shall be published in the newspapers; but it does mean that everything arrived at, step by step, shall be communicated to the enlightened sense of the world.

I agree with the Senator from Idaho that there is nothing better calculated to keep the peace of the world than to let the intelligence of the world know what the diplomats of the world are doing. That is what President Wilson wants. That is what David Lloyd George wants. But the Senator ought not to be astonished at continental Europe after a thousand years of mistraining in regard to these things. Even republican France is a little bit doubtful about allowing all the steps of diplomatic procedure to go to the public.

The Senator must remember that they have not a public which they can trust, as we have and as the English have. They have some reason to be more distrustful of their public than we have. I have no doubt that before this is over—in a few days, indeed—all the substantial steps taken in that conference will be communicated to the public fully, and that we will overcome the continental distrust of its public. We have no distrust of ours, because it has proven itself worthy of trust for years and years. The British have no distrust of theirs; but the Senator and I both ought to remember that we have "to make allowances," as the darkies say, for people who are not situated as we are. So that I think you can deal with some degree of charity with the late decision which evidently was pronounced by the non-English-speaking races at the conference.

Wherever English goes, publicity may go. Wherever the language of Shakespeare and of Milton can go, men can trust one another to speak plainly, so that open negotiations can be effected.

But the Senator must remember that there is only one language of Shakespeare and Milton so far as he and I know, and that it is not true of all the other people in the world that they can trust their public so considerably as we can ours. I think it is about time we were coming to the conclusion that the time has arrived even with them, and I agree with the Senator; but the Senator must make allowances for the fact that they are slow to arrive at that conclusion because their past history has not justified it.

I am glad, indeed, that the Senator rose to uphold the hand of Woodrow Wilson in the rough tussle he is having in Europe, upon this particular question at any rate, and I hope that what he has said will have some effect in Paris, if it is read there. I do not know whether what he and I say here will be read there or not, but it might be. Perhaps the President might find it to his interest to quote it, and if he does I hope it will have some effect, especially upon the French. I do not understand the French position, because they, too, have arrived at a stage of civilization where they can trust their public if they will. Clemenceau can trust his public if he just has the courage to do it, and all the help we have got to have is his, and then we will make these proceedings public to the common conscience and common sense of the democratic world.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I make bold to offer a suggestion in accordance with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. However, I view an aspect with more seriousness than seems to be at present in the mind of either of the able Senators—at least one that they have not expressed, if they feel it.

Mr. President, if there is any force of Europe or of any other nation sitting about the peace table which shall be able to overrule the President of the United States in his first effort of his first undertaking to obtain the first principle, merely publicity in the proceedings, I warn that force they will by their conduct reopen the conflict. They will precipitate anew more war; and, sir, it will be because every little nation aspiring to have its rights ascertained and declared, every people of that nation seeking to have their liberties acknowledged, will believe that that first move of enforced secrecy is with the object of defeating them; that its purpose in hiding the declaration, the deliberation, and the decision is to work a secret conclusion against their contentions. While such secrecy is pending these people will be the first out of that very suspicion suggested by the Senator from Mississippi—through the ignorance of people who, heretofore unacquainted with the methods of diplomacy and previously never trusted with its course, will suspect the object—and, as the Senator from Idaho most aptly expressed, those in Europe will at once conclude that all the promises that have heretofore been made on this subject at the very outset are decided to be ignored or betrayed. If that moment really comes, these lesser nations will not await the second decision. They will decide then and there that they shall protect themselves.

Remember, sir, their soldiers rest on arms. Their tents are filled with smoking explosives and their weapons are still the companions of these fighters. The purposes for which they went into this war will burn in their hearts and flame in their minds. We shall have another outbreak from these little people to protect themselves at once by obtaining possession of the disputed ground and premises which it claims, because they will decide that this first move of secrecy is against them. They will conclude that however sincere the President was to protect them, yet his very first movement was circumvented and defeated by numerical majority on the one hand and the inheritance from the methods of the Congress of Vienna on the other.

Mr. President, for that reason let these people who would not hearken to the counsel of the President of the United States beware. The temper of the soldier in Europe—American, English, French, indeed of every nationality, waiting to be released, hoping to return to his home—is baffled, fancying himself deceived, is in a disposition that is not well to trifle with.

It was that returning soldier of the legions of Pompey, Cæsar, and Rome who, when he did return to Rome, burning under disappointment and believing that he had been tricked by the consuls, seized possession of the imperial country and visited upon that empire the devastation that 50 years did not remedy. It was that offended soldier under Napoleon, returning to France, who fancied he had been tricked by those who had been returned to government, who became the commune of France, property was destroyed, life was decimated, civilization was aflame, and a devastated form of all organized life was the only relic which the eyes of three generations could afterwards behold.

Therefore, sir, not only must these peace commissioners, whoever they are, understand that this body and this American people is behind the President of the United States in this his very first undertaking, but they will, sir, construe the movement of opposing him as the first proof of the enmity on the part of those who oppose him and evidence of their opposition to the purposes of America. From that moment every other step these commissioners will take will be under the cloud of suspicion and distrust from all people. Let them know it.

Mr. President, there is a second thought, however, which I beg to impose upon the consideration of my very able friend, the Senator from Idaho, and the Senate and ask consideration of it. As much as we would care to have the European commissioners understand that we are behind the President—and in this respect many Senators on the other side who have never yet spoken can be depended upon when the time comes to give him full support upon this phase, sir—as much as we may hope that the foreign commissioners may be impressed by our attitude, and as greatly as we felicitously dwell on the prospect of influencing them for their own conduct and for the success of their deliberations, let this other thought, however, be uppermost with us, I pray you. Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States, has assured the people of the United States, not only in the declaration read by the Senator but in four speeches made yonder in Europe, speaking with the solemnity of his position, that the publicity of these proceedings shall be assured to the public of the United States; that the public of the United States shall know what transpires. He has assured you and the country that there shall be no censorship upon the cables, as far as we can prevent that; that there shall be no censorship upon the report of the proceedings, as far as we can prevent that.

Mr. President, it is the duty of the President of the United States to prove to the people of this country that he is keeping faith with the promise he made them. We can not permit the commissioners of Europe or any other power in the world to put President Wilson in the position where he may be charged with intentionally deceiving his own people or being unable to keep faith with them without betraying the source of the responsibility. We will let no delicacy growing out of past associations with either ally or enemy close our mouths to the full and complete explanation to America of whoever is the source which we will regard as either violating the faith we owe to our country or deceiving in their conduct the promise to the President of the United States.

If the President of the United States shall in this one material necessity of mere publicity to his own people of the thing he is doing in their behalf fail to keep that covenant, he will awaken suspicion in the hearts of all those in his own land and from that moment stand weakened in his place. He knows that. We know that.

Therefore, Mr. President, the very first and supreme duty, as I see it, is that we shall give him support in every way, that he may keep faith with his own people, that they may never have occasion to suspect the sincerity of his purpose or doubt the devotion of his duty.

For that reason, Mr. President, I happily, sir, concur in the sentiment of the Senator from Idaho; I rejoice in the gladness of the Senator from Mississippi; but I add other reasons of more solemn character, from my position, so that the President's word to his own country must be kept, and knowing him as we do, we feel that from him can come the expression of the just man of the Merchant of Venice:

> My word once given forth shall not be recalled.
> Shall I lay perjury to my soul? No; not for Venice.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I want to add what little I can to what has been said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] so well of that which at the very outset of the peace negotiations becomes of transcendent importance. I wish to add one thought to what he has said, bringing home, it seems to me, more clearly, even though not in his forceful language expressed, just what this means.

In January, 1918, the President stated his 14 points. They have become since that time somewhat famous. Every nation on the face of the earth has accepted those 14 points of peace as laid down by the President of the United States, with the possible exception of one, into which we need not go at this time. In accepting those 14 points of peace which the spokesman of the United States gave to the world, the first was, as has been adverted to here again and again, "open covenants of peace, openly arrived at."

Yet at the very instant when the peace conference assembles in Europe the first of these covenants of peace accepted by every nation on the face of the earth is deliberately violated, and instead of open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, we are given, and the world is given, the same old deceptive secret diplomacy, and our only news is a communique, which we know from experience of the past four years is made merely to cover up what has been done, and which does not state at all the facts of what is transpiring.

So the matter becomes of importance, not only to the President there, and enlists all of us in his support, but it becomes of importance, too, to the whole Nation, which has accepted these 14 covenants concerning peace, the first of which in the very initial meeting of the peace conference is discarded.

So, Mr. President, I think if I had the power, if this sort of thing be persisted in for the next two or three days, some affirmative action should be taken by the Senate, something by which we may say affirmatively here that we insist, as a part of the treaty-making power, that there shall be open discussion, or at least information daily given out of all that is transpiring, that the truth shall be known to all our people.

There is another aspect of this thing that appeals to me, too. It is humiliating and it is irritating to me to have the President of the United States bottled up in any kind of conference. It is humiliating and it is irritating to me to have our President enmeshed in the entanglements of secret European diplomacy, and to have him sitting there as a member of a conference, with his lips sealed by agreement of the conference, and unable to say to the people of the United States and to the Government of the United States what is there transpiring, and compelled by vote of those sitting with him to refrain from communicating with our people. If the President shall fight his way through this peculiar entanglement and this mesh of secret diplomacy of Europe, I will be very glad to lend him such humble support and give him such cheer as can be given by one Member of this body.

It emphasizes, after all, in the last analysis, the necessity for what has been suggested upon this floor of an American policy, and an American policy respecting all that is transpiring across the water to-day. I hope that out of it will come one thing at least—a policy which will consider America first; that with the least possible delay the men in khaki who represent the United States across the sea will be brought home and brought home at the earliest possible moment. I hope that out of it, too, will come the determination on the part of the Senate and the Government of the United States to leave to other nations, the nations beyond the sea, the policing of the world hereafter, and that will give us the definite policy to bring home our troops, wherever they may be, as soon as our present obligations shall have been fulfilled.

THE CENSUS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There are some minor amendments that should be adopted. On page 12, line 11, between the word "of" and the word "census," insert the word "the."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Section 10 is out of the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is a minor correction, anyway.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be amended by the conferees.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is an unimportant change, and doubtless will be attended to in conference. What other sections were amended by the France amendments?

The SECRETARY. Sections 1, 2, 8, 9, and 10.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In section 12, line 4, page 15, the word "provision" should be "provisions."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In section 15, line 3, the word "commission" is misspelled; the letters "i" and "s" should be transposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. On page 22, in line 6, I move to strike out the word "or" before the word "clerk," the last word in the line.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In line 7, insert a comma after the word "employee."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is all.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the bill and amendments and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SHEPPARD, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE conferees on the part of the Senate.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the pending bill, coming to us from the House of Representatives, has been carefully considered by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. The bill was the subject of lengthy investigation by the Judiciary Committee of the other House before it was reported to the House.

For a long time it has been realized that the judges of our United States courts have been inadequately compensated for their services. There has been a general belief that there should be some increase in their salaries. The House Judiciary Committe reported a bill based upon the plan of making the minimum pay of the district court judge $6,500, with an increased salary based upon the population of the district, the minimum salary of the circuit court judge $7,500, with the maximum salary $1,000 in excess of the largest salary of the district court judge in the circuit. The House modified the bill, and made the salary of the district court judges $7,500 and of the circuit court judges $8,500. The subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate have blended the House action and the action of the House Judiciary Committee. We have made the minimum salary of a district court judge $7,000, with a maximum of $9,000, and the minimum salary of a circuit court judge $8,000, with a maximum of $10,000, and we have provided that in districts of over a million and a half inhabitants there may be an increase of salary of the district judges to the maximum of $9,000, and we have placed the salary of the circuit court judges $1,000 beyond the salary of the district court judges. This is substantially the bill.

The House also increased the compensation of the judges of the Court of Claims. The Senate Judiciary Committee has increased, also, salaries of judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and judges of the Court of Appeals of the District.

The bill further provides a measure that it is believed will be very helpful to our Federal judiciary. Now, at 70 years of age, with 10 years of service, a district or circuit court judge can resign with full pay for the remainder of his life, but he is removed entirely from any class of work upon the bench. There have been many instances in which judges of both of those courts have felt entirely able to do nearly full work, but not quite full work, and they have hesitated about resigning, because they felt, though entitled to full compensation after resigning, that they wanted to do something; that they wanted to serve. This bill allows a judge who is entitled to resign, instead of resigning, to retire, and thereafter he may be assigned to work and can do all the work that his physical condition still makes it practicable for him to do.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Georgia has explained that now at 70 years of age, after 10 years of service, a judge may retire and receive his full pay during the balance of his life. I understand that the bill provides that in the case of inability of a judge who has not retired and who is 70 years old there can be another judge appointed for his district; but I do not understand—and I will ask the Senator from Georgia to explain his idea of the matter—the intention of the bill, whether it is the intention to appoint, whether or no, another judge in a district before the sitting judge has retired, although he may be perfectly able and perfectly willing to do the work of his district.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is not the intention at all, and that can not be done under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I concluded that under the language of the bill it could not be done unless it were done in a rather radical way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It could not be done. The bill carefully guards that. Only when the judge is physically and mentally permanently unable to perform efficiently all the duties of his office can the additional judge be appointed unless the sitting judge voluntarily retires.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to ask the Senator, with his permission, a question on another branch of the subject. As I understand the bill—unintentionally, of course—I assume an injustice would be done to judges of the courts here in Washington. When it is undertaken to apply the rule of population and it gets into the millions, of course you have not suitable units of measurements. The consequence is that under this bill, if it is not amended, we are dooming those judges who have a very great deal of business to do, and especially as to the court of appeals, which I believe has one-third of the amount of all the business of all the circuits of the United States—we are dooming all of those to the minimum salary with no chance of advancement. Consequently, though they are doing more work than judges of the other courts, they will be getting far less salary. I think the Senator from Georgia must have observed that, and I trust when amendments are offered—I have one which I intend to offer—that they may be considered on their merits.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think this question should be considered on its merits. I have been thinking about the provision with reference to the plan of compensation for the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, and I hardly think it meets the situation. The judges of the Supreme Court of the District are practically district judges and judges of the Court of Appeals of the District are practically circuit court judges. When we undertake to apply to them the population rule, it can not give them any increase beyond the minimum salary, and yet I believe it is true that the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia do a vast amount of most important work. I shall be glad to listen to any amendment that is offered, and if my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee who are upon the floor at that time do not object, I shall offer no objection.

I ask now that the bill be taken up for committee amendments, and as we reach section 3, which applies to the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District, I shall be glad to stop to hear amendments or substitutes from the floor of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to inquire if the Senator is asking unanimous consent that the committee amendments shall be first considered?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is my request.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can see a good reason why that should be done in the case of appropriation bills, but I do not think it ought to be done in the case of bills of this character. I have no amendment to offer myself, but I shall object to any unanimous consent requiring the disposition of committee amendments before any other amendment is considered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, without the exclusion of other amendments, I ask that we proceed for the present to consider committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 1, page 1, line 6, after the word "amended," to insert the words "so as," so as to read:

That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, after line 6, to strike out:

"SEC. 2. Each of the district judges shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year, to be paid in monthly installments."

SEC. 2. That section 118 of the act aforesaid be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 118. There shall be in the second, seventh, and eighth circuits, respectively, four circuit judges; in the fourth circuit, two circuit judges; and in each of the other circuits, three circuit judges, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. They shall receive a salary of $8,500 a year each, payable monthly. Each circuit judge shall reside within his circuit. The circuit judges in each circuit shall be judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit, and it shall be the duty of each circuit judge in each circuit to sit as one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit from time to time according to law: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent any circuit judge holding district court or otherwise, as provided for and authorized in other sections of this act."

And insert:

"SEC. 2. The salaries to be paid to the district judges shall be $7,000 per annum, except that in districts having a population of over 1,000,000 the district judge or each of the district judges appointed for those districts, respectively, shall receive annually additional compensation at the rate of $500 for each half million of population or part thereof in their respective districts in excess of the first 1,000,000, which additional compensation, as the same may be ascertained, as aforesaid, in the said several districts, respectively, together with said sum of $7,000, shall be the annual salary payable to the district judge or each of the district judges in such districts, respectively: Provided, however, That the salary of any district judge appointed for more than one district shall be determined on the basis of the aggregate population of the districts for which he is appointed. Such salaries shall be paid in equal monthly installments, beginning on the first day of the month next following the approval of this act, and the amount to be so paid in the several districts, under the provisions of this act, shall be ascertained by the Attorney General of the United States from the last Federal census and certified by him to the proper disbursing officer or officers. As soon after the 1st day of January next succeeding the taking of any future Federal census as may be practicable any changes in such salaries due to changes in population shall be ascertained and determined by the Attorney General of the United States and shall become effective on and after the 1st day of July next following: Provided, however, That at no time shall the salary of any district judge be diminished during his continuance in office, nor shall the salary of any district judge at any time exceed the sum of $9,000 a year."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there must have been, of course, some controlling reason actuating the committee in their recommendation of this section as a substitute for section 2 of the House bill; but I am unable, until I am better informed, to see any improvement which the proposed amendment makes over the House provision. Nor do I perceive the necessity of paying a district judge a higher salary because he lives in a district containing a population of more than a million, and thus regulating salaries on the basis of constituency or jurisdiction.

The State of Florida has two districts and, if I mistake not, three district judges. The State of Colorado, which is approximately equal in population to the State of Florida, having a population of approximately 1,000,000, has only one district judge. The work which the district judge of my State is necessarily required to do is very much greater than the work which is required in Florida, where the judicial force of the United States is at least double, and I think three times as large, and, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] suggests to me, exclusive of admiralty business, it is probably very much in excess of the usual business which now goes to the Federal courts; but the judge of my district, its population at the last census being a trifle under a million, notwithstanding that fact, will receive the identical salary which each of the three judges in the State of Florida will receive.

In your own State, Mr. President [Mr. KENDRICK in the chair], the population is less than half a million. The district judge of the State of Wyoming has a large business. I think I may safely say that, in proportion to the population of the State, he has as extensive a business to transact as can be found in any district in the United States. Certainly that is true in times of peace.

Mr. WARREN. May I add to what the Senator says, that that particular district judge, notwithstanding the great amount of work he has to do, is called upon to serve in other courts—courts about, or, in case of illness, and so forth, in adjoining districts.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that is true. He is the oldest district judge in the ninth circuit. While all comparisons are invidious, and I will not say he is the best of all the district judges in that district, I certainly am justified in saying that he is the equal of any judge within the district, both in his capacity for work and his experience upon the bench and his ability to transact business. He occupies, therefore, a place in the district where, under the terms of this proposed amendment, his salary can not under any circumstances exceed the minimum fixed in the bill. I use that instance by way of illustration of my doubt as to whether population is a proper basis for establishing the salaries of district judges.

Another reflection along the same line is this: In many—I will not say most, but in many—of the districts of the United States where the population is in excess of 1,000,000, two judges are appointed for the district. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] some time ago, I think, succeeded in securing the passage of a bill providing for an additional judge in his district. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] introduced and succeeded in securing the passage of a bill increasing the number of district judges in the district of which San Francisco is the center.

So that this proposed amendment, I think, works unjustly in both ways. It fails to recognize the vast amount of business transacted in comparatively small districts—that is, small on the basis of population—and at the same time it rewards judges, regardless of their number, where the population of the district to which they are appointed exceeds 1,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption along the line on which he is now speaking?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It strikes me, as the Senator says, that the mere fact of population has very little to do with the labor of the court. Take Arizona, for instance. Recently the Senate passed a bill providing for another judge there on the ground that it is a physical impossibility for the present judge to transact the business in Arizona—a State as large as three of the ordinary Eastern States, and with courts held at four different places. From the 14th of last March—I have not the data before me, as I gave it to the Representative of Arizona in the House for use there—but, speaking generally, I should be willing to make the assertion that there are few, if any, Federal courts in the United States that transact the business that that court in my State is compelled to transact.

Mr. THOMAS. And that, too, since the State went for prohibition.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is true, although the Federal courts have very little to do along that line, as the State courts have jurisdiction.

I had the exact history of the record; but suffice it to say that the judge on the bench had on the docket in March some 350 cases—law, equity, and criminal. He has sat for five years without one week's real recess, and from the 14th day of last March up to last November he had disposed of some 500 cases, sitting often day and night; and yet he now has on his docket something like 600 cases. The effort to get another judge to help out seems to create the impression that we are trying to get some Democrat appointed to an office, and that is what has met me here and met me in the House. There is nothing in it.

I do not want to take the Senator's time, if I am intruding on him.

Mr. THOMAS. Go right ahead.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We have been attempting to get an additional judge for Arizona, but we can not.

It strikes me that the House bill is infinitely better than the Senate substitute. It made the salary of every one of these district judges $7,500 flat. That is little enough. The judge of my court has got to quit, or else he will simply ruin his health in an effort to keep the jails partly cleared, as well as he can, and save as much expense as possible to the Government.

That is the condition that the matter is in; and the flat $7,500, as the House bill provided, strikes me as infinitely better. Under the Senate committee amendment the mere fact that a million men live in a district is to give a man a thousand dollars more for presiding over the court, instead of estimating the amount of business that the judge has before him. The expense of living is just as high or higher where we have to travel from place to place in the West as it is anywhere in the East; and estimating it on the basis of a mere population that has no Federal business, and fixing the additional salary on that basis, seems to me without any reason whatever. If it were put on the basis of the business the court transacts, that might produce a good many suits that otherwise would not be brought; I appreciate that. Therefore, it seems to me, the Senator's criticism is exactly right, that the House bill, with a flat $7,500 salary, should not be objected to by anyone, with the amount of business that these courts have; and it strikes me that the House bill, without amendment, ought to be passed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the position of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is justified by the facts which he has recited; but if the system of salaries for district judges proposed by this amendment be the sound one, the same principle should extend to the circuit court of appeals.

The eighth circuit, which comprises the State which I in part represent here, is the largest circuit in the United States, geographically; and while I am not able to state off-hand the population which is comprised in that circuit, it is certainly very large, and the business which is transacted by that circuit is greater than that of any other circuit in the country. That being so, and assuming that the population is larger, why should not each of the circuit judges for the eighth circuit receive a greater salary than will be paid to the circuit judges for, we will say, one of the southern or eastern districts—the second, third, or fourth?

There is surely a disparity in the populations of the circuits. There must be, in the nature of things, as there is geographically, and as there is also in the territory and the population of the United States judicial districts. So that the system is not symmetrical, it is not equitable, nor, in my judgment, is it consistent, unless the salaries to be paid to the circuit judges shall conform to and be regulated by the same basis.

I have the very highest opinion of the ability of the Senator having charge of the bill, and I know that he must have reasons which are conclusive to him, at least, for proposing these amendments to the House bill; but as far as I am able to judge until I am better informed, the House provision is far preferable, if we are to raise these salaries at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I can give to the Senate the reasons that influenced the subcommittee that investigated this question; and they are substantially the same reasons that influenced the Judiciary Committee of the House.

Take, as an illustration, the city of New York. We find our Federal judges there paid about half as much as the State court judges.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, one-third as much. We pay our supreme court judges $17,500 a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from New York suggests that they are paid one-third as much.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that is true of New York; but in Colorado the salaries of the district judges and the circuit judges are both larger than the salaries which we pay to the judges of our supreme court, and we only pay $4,000 a year to the judges of the district court.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I was wishing to indicate to the Senate the situation that confronted us, that led both of the Judiciary Committees to conclude that some recognition of salary based upon population was necessary.

Take the case in the city of New York, where the volume of business is immense, where the successful lawyer finds as a result of his efforts an income much larger than in smaller communities, and where the expenses of living are much greater. It was believed that some system ought to be adopted that would make it practicable to carry the salaries in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and a few other portions of the country, reasonably beyond the salaries in States like my own, or districts in which there are no large cities; and this plan of population was adopted. The House plan ran the salary of the circuit court judge up to $11,000, and the salary of the district court judge to $10,000. We restricted it so as to limit the circuit court judge to a thousand dollars less, and the district court judge to a thousand dollars less.

For a long time the same pay was not given to all of our district judges, or all of our circuit-court judges, before they became judges of the circuit court of appeals. The difference in volume of business and in the location was recognized, and the salaries varied. The salaries of our district attorneys now vary. The salaries of our collectors of internal revenue vary. So we felt that we were justified in following the view of the Judiciary Committee of the House, and, undertaking to make some provision by which in certain of the larger districts, where incomes were larger, where expenses of living were relatively somewhat larger than in the smaller districts, and the business larger, larger salaries should be paid.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is a great deal of reason in the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia; but the trouble is that this standard does not accomplish his purpose altogether, or it accomplishes a good deal more than it. You take the district as a basis. Now, the same population in a State may be divided into two divisions. The judges do exactly the same business; they live under the same circumstances and in the same general community; yet in the one case the salary would be largely increased over the minimum, and in the other it would not be increased at all. That is the objection that I have to this standard.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I recognize the criticism which the Senator from Iowa places upon it. We do not submit this action without some doubt ourselves. We do not believe that we have certainly done the only thing that could be done; but we felt that we could, perhaps, come nearer obviating the difficulties in this way than in any other way. We felt that it was probably the best plan that we could suggest.

We raised the minimum salary of the district judge to $7,000, as against $6,500 in the original House bill. We stopped the maximum at $9,000, as against $10,000 in the House. We raised the minimum for the judge of the circuit court of appeals to $8,000, instead of $7,500. We stopped the maximum at $10,000. We undertook to raise a little at the bottom and trim off a little at the top in this plan, because we felt that the plan itself had defects in it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will allow me just a moment more in order to exemplify what I have just stated, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] what effect this amendment would have upon the salary of the district judges in Minnesota. How much would the salary of a district judge in Minnesota be under the provisions of this law?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can tell the Senator, unless the Senator from Minnesota has the figures.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not know that the Senator from Georgia had the figures, or I would have asked him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I think I have them here.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator give them? I will look and see if I have them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My figures here give the district court judge in Minnesota $8,500 and the circuit court judge $9,500.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. Now, Mr. President, that brings clearly to the attention of the Senate the disparity which I mentioned a few moments ago. Minnesota has one district, and therefore the salary of a district judge is determined by the population of the whole State. Iowa has two districts and has two districts judges only; and the salary of the district judges in my State would not be increased at all over the minimum under the operation of the proposed statute. So we would have the situation of two adjoining States—and they are about as nearly alike as two States could be—in which the district judges in one were receiving $8,500 and in the other $7,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But in one State you divide the State and have two judges, and in the other State the one judge does all the work.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true; but there is not more than one district judge in Minnesota. There is not the same number of judges.

Mr. THOMAS. They all receive the increased salary.

Mr. CUMMINS. They all get an increased salary. I have no objection in the world to that; but you are proposing a plan here that will create the greatest possible discontent everywhere, because it is discriminating against judges without any reason.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator might add that Minnesota has at least the same number of judges in the one district that Iowa has in the two districts. Under the operation of this law all the judges will get the increased salary, but neither of the Iowa judges will get anything more than the minimum, if the business in the two States and the population of the two States are practically identical.

Mr. CUMMINS. Minnesota has a little larger population than Iowa.

Mr. THOMAS. Not much.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not materially larger. In our State we divide into districts two million and a half people—into two districts two million and a half people—and the districts are so divided that they are about equal in population. So that in each district there are about 1,250,000 people, not enough in either district to entitle the district judge to any advance over the minimum compensation by reason of population, although the judges do their work and live under practically the same conditions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand there is one district in Minnesota and there are two districts in Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; there are one district and two judges in Minnesota.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have two districts and two judges.

Mr. KELLOGG. There are five divisions; but, as I recollect, those are divisions of the district. They hold court in five different places, and there are two judges of the district court.

Mr. WARREN. What is the population?

Mr. KELLOGG. The population is two million and a quarter or two million and a half.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am obliged to recognize that there are inequalities in this bill, but I do not see how we could take care of the necessities for the larger salaries in the larger places except in this way, and we undertook to put it in the best shape we could along that line.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if he knows of any other instance? I do not recall any other States that have only one district and one judge.

Mr. THOMAS. My State has only one district and one judge.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course some States have more than one district, but I mean one district with more than one judge. I do not recall any others.

Mr. THOMAS. There are States having more than one district in which the number of judges exceed the number of districts.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is the same condition in Nevada as in Colorado.

Mr. FLETCHER. And in Nevada, Arizona, and New Mexico.

Mr. THOMAS. There are States that have more than one district in which the number of judges exceeds the number of districts and each of those judges under this bill notwithstanding population is entitled to the same salary.

Mr. FLETCHER. There are very few of those cases. I think there have been some proposals passed by the Senate but not yet passed by the House where additional judges are provided in some particular districts but there are very few of those cases and very few cases similar to the Minnesota case. It is almost impossible to make a bill that will fit all conditions. I believe it is true that if the Senate bill is passed it will not mean quite as large a draft on the Treasury as the bill passed by the House. I do not know whether the Senator from Georgia has figured that out exactly, but it is my impression that the committee did. I think if the Senate committee bill is passed it will not mean quite as large an increased expenditure in judges' salaries as the bill passed by the House would call for. In other words, if we make a minimum salary of $7,000 for district judges and only increase in those districts where the population and business increase, you will not pay out as much money for the salaries of district judges as you would if you made all the salaries for every district judge $7,500.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For district and circuit judges together the Senate committee bill appropriates a little more than the bill as passed by the House.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not hear the Senator's remarks; there was so much noise in the Chamber. Will the Senator please repeat it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For district and circuit judges combined the increase is a little more in the Senate committee bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. What is the increase? Is it not about $200,000 altogether?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The total increase in the bill as passed by the House is $189,000. The total increase by the Senate committee bill is $229,000. I will say again to Senators that it is a matter for them to determine. I believe from what I have heard from Senators that there is almost a unanimous view in the Senate that increases should take place. I have had so many Senators speak to me of their interest in this bill and their desire to support the increase of compensation for the judges that I feel sure the general principle of an increase will receive the cordial support of the Senate. Just what plan should be pursued is for you to decide. We give you the plan recommended by the Judiciary Committee of the House, modified as I have stated. The House itself desire to treat all the judges, without regard to territory, in exactly the same way. It is simply for the Senate to say which they prefer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, some one said many years ago—I do not remember just now who it was but I believe it was Edmund Burke—that the trouble with the English-speaking races is that they constitute a government of lawyers—lawyers in the legislative assemblies, lawyers making laws for lawyers' benefit, and lawyers fixing salaries for lawyers' benefit. Whoever may have said this, there is a great deal of truth in it. If you will look over the membership of the House of Representatives and of the Senate and of the House of Commons in Great Britain, you will find that a large majority of them are lawyers and they legislate in behalf of lawyers, as is perfectly natural.

So far as I can ascertain, this is a bill to increase the salaries of lawyers who have become judges, and who, having become judges, are sacrosanct and ought to be above criticism even as to the amount of money they are to be paid.

There is not any lack of lawyers in the United States who are hunting positions as Federal judges. A vacancy can not occur in a single State of the Union when there are not from 10 to 12 of the most prominent lawyers in the State seeking the position, desiring very honestly to have it for public purposes, not for the reason of the payment of the salary, but because they want to serve the public. They are always there.

I have had a man or two appointed as Federal judge, and the Senator from Georgia, too, has, I expect, although I do not know. I imagine we both had a great deal of difficulty in determining which one of the several men applying for the place we should recommend. They all wanted the position, and wanted it very badly. Men who vied with the Senator and with myself when we were attorneys in our practice—it did not take much to vie with me, but it took a great deal to vie with him—were seeking positions as Federal judges, and very glad to get them at the salaries already paid.

There is no reason in the world why the salaries should be raised. Senators tell me that at certain points in the United States certain Federal judges must decide a certain multitudinous number of cases for which they ought to be extraordinarily remunerated, and that there are other places where they decide a less number of cases for which they ought not to be extraordinarily remunerated. I find that a man can just do so much work in a day, no matter what he is—a judge or what not—and that he does not give himself extra hours on account of extra labor, either; that the average judge devotes about six hours a day in public to the public business, and if he is a very conscientious man he devotes more to it in private.

I am tired of government by lawyers, for lawyers, and for lawyers' payments and compensations. I do not speak with any antagonism. I am the son of a lawyer, the grandson of a lawyer, the great-grandson of a lawyer, the great-great-grandson of a lawyer, and a lawyer myself in a way—not, I thank God, in a commercial way. I never made so awfully much money out of it, because I did not want to go into that part of the practice that based itself purely upon commercial compensation.

I do not see any reason why these salaries should be increased. The lawyers, judging by the fact that they all want the places, do not see any reason for it. The men whom I have had appointed as judges and the men whom the Senator from Georgia has had appointed as judges did not see any particular reason for it, because they took the job at the old price and were very glad to get it. They summoned the whole family up that night and thanked God for the opportunity to take the place. I suppose the wife prayed and the children prayed, and all of them rendered thanks to God that they had gotten the position.

A lawyer with ermine on him is just simply a lawyer. We call him a judge, but we have not added anything to his consideration or his ability or his capacity. If he did not want to take the place as a Federal judge at $6.000 a year salary he need not have taken it. All he has to do is to let it alone.

By the way, the chief judges of the United States, men like Chief Justice Marshall and Story, were men who never quarreled about their salaries. Each one of them considered himself peculiarly blessed in having the salary which he had. There is not a line in all the autobiography and biography of Chief Justice Marshall complaining about the fact that he was not adequately compensated as a lawyer. He could not have made $2,500 a year in Virginia practicing law.

He never had made it in his entire life. Story could not have made $5,000 a year in Massachusetts practicing law, and never had made it in his entire life. Yet they were two of the very best judges the United States ever had, and why? Principally because they never practiced law for money. The average lawyer who practices law for money and whose aim in his profession is to make money is not a good lawyer and will not make a good judge. He is merely a self-seeker. He is merely a fellow who wants money handed out to him, and if he is that sort of a fellow he will not make a good judge, whatever else he may make.

Old John B. Minor, of the University of Virginia, in my opinion was the greatest lawyer this country has seen in half a century. He scarcely made a living practicing law, because when a case came in to him the ethics of which he did not approve he turned it down. He educated more great lawyers than any man in America except Chancellor Kent, of New York. Kent, of New York, never made any immense amount of money practicing law, as the Senator from New York can testify, but Kent was a great judge, and he was a great judge for the reason John B. Minor was and Story was and Marshall was, to wit, because he had never looked to the law simply and solely as a method of making money.

Mr. President, I do not believe you are going to attract to the bench the best judges by increasing the salaries. I believe if you increase them high enough you will attract the money seeker, the moneygrubber, and the money lover, and whenever you get them on the bench you will have a bad judiciary.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending committee amendment and ask to have it read.

The SECRETARY. Amend by inserting, after the word "judges" at the end of line 16, page 2, the words "including the United States district judges for the Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, this bill does not apply to United States district judges for the Territories of the United States. It applies only to United States district judges for districts on the mainland or in the United States proper. There are two United States district judges for the Territory of Hawaii. The salary of each is $6,000 per year. They are not appointed for life, as are the United States district judges in the United States proper. They are appointed for only six years.

I do not see any reason why the United States district judges for the Territories should not receive as much compensation as other United States district judges. The United States district judges for the district of Hawaii, as I say, serve only for six years, and in that respect are at a disadvantage with those United States district judges who serve for life or during good behavior. They have to go thousands of miles away from home and live in a strange land. The cost of living in Hawaii is even higher than it is on the mainland of the United States.

The United States district judges for the Territory of Hawaii are good judges and should receive as much compensation as the United States district judges on the mainland. Furthermore, I think the United States district judges in the different Territories should be paid something like the same compensation. The United States district judges for Alaska receive $7,500 per year. I can see no reason why United States district judges for the Territory of Alaska should receive more compensation than United States district judges for the Territory of Hawaii. There is no reason for it. When you come to reason, there can be no reason for it. The United States district judges for Hawaii should receive just as much compensation as those who serve in Alaska. Hawaii is as far away from the mainland of the United States; the cost of living is just as great, I am sure, in Hawaii as in Alaska.

There may be some difference of opinion among Senators as to the wisdom of this bill. There may be some difference of opinion as to the justification and advisability of enacting this proposed legislation and increasing the salaries of Federal judges; but, if we are going to do it at all, it seems to me we ought to do it equitably and fairly and not increase some and exclude others. It seems to me, if we are going to enact this legislation at all, it should be fairly and equitably framed and put upon a plane, so that all of the United States district judges shall be fairly treated and compensated somewhat alike. Then, when the bill is perfected in that way, it is a question for the Senate to decide whether or not the bill shall be enacted into law. I seek to perfect the bill in an equitable and fair way before the question of its final passage comes before the Senate.

I believe my amendment should be adopted. There is a population of about a half million people in Hawaii. This amendment to the committee amendment, if adopted, would give the United States district judges for the Territory of Hawaii a salary of just $7,000 per annum. It would fix their salaries at the minimum salary provided in this bill. It would give them the lowest salary provided by this bill for any United States district judge, and I think they are certainly worthy of that. They are good men and good judges and there can be no ground for discriminating against them. It is apparent they are discriminated against, though, when you remember that United States district judges for Alaska are given $7,500 a year. My amendment would pay the Hawaiian district judges of the United States $500 per year less than the United States district judges for the Territory of Alaska receive, and would give them the minimum that any United States district judge on the mainland would receive.

It seems to me the amendment should appeal to the Senate as being absolutely fair, just, and reasonable, and there should be no doubt of its adoption.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not wish to take much of the Senate's time, but I am loath to allow the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to pass without at least attempting to answer them.

The Senator states that most of the Members of the House and Senate are lawyers, and therefore it looks to him like they are voting to increase the salaries of lawyers. Great as that argument may seem, I submit that we are not in the habit of putting men on the bench unless they are lawyers, and, of course, when we vote to increase their salaries we vote to increase the salaries of lawyers.

But beyond that, if it is an intimation or an insinuation that the lawyers of the Senate and the House of Representatives are seeking to increase these salaries for personal advantage or in the hope of some time occupying a place on the bench and getting the larger salaries, I am astonished that the Senator from Mississippi should make such an insinuation. The public men in both Houses of Congress and in the legislatures and in public life for more than 100 years have come from that great and honorable profession, and it is a slander upon them to say that they are voting to increase their own salaries.

Mr. President, of course lawyers can be found to occupy the judicial positions at the present salaries, such as they are, and I do not wish in any way to reflect upon the men who are occupying those positions, for the Federal judiciary has during the entire life of this Republic been of a very high grade, and the judges whom I have known, though many times serving for much less than their abilities would justify, are men of high character and ideals and possess eminent qualifications for their position.

But, Mr. President, because men can be procured to fill positions is no answer to the argument that they should be paid a fair salary consistent with the incomes of men of their profession, although I do not claim they should be paid any such amount as men of their profession of like ability can earn. I have no doubt that every office of justice of the peace in important cities could be filled by lawyers, but that is no argument to the effect that a justice of the peace would be suitable to sit upon the court of appeals bench.

Mr. President, it is a well-known fact, not only to lawyers but to everyone, that judges of the United States courts have not for many years been paid a salary commensurate with the very important positions they occupy, and it is becoming increasingly difficult in the large centers of population, where professional incomes are high, as well as in the villages and rural districts, to obtain the best men for appointment as United States judges. In the last few years judges have been resigning in the State of New York, because they simply could not live on the salaries which they there received.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have been informed by former Senator O'Gorman, of New York, that the justices of the peace and the police magistrates of New York City receive $8,000 a year, while the United States district judges only get $6,000 a year.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not informed as to that, but the judges of the Supreme Court of the City of New York, which is the nisi prius court, get $17,500 a year, while the United States district judges get $6,000 a year.

Now, let us consider this fact. It is not solely a question of whether the man can buy the necessaries of life and can live on the salary that is now paid, but it is a question of paying salaries commensurate with the incomes of lawyers in the community; and no one will claim that any man who is qualified to sit upon the United States district court or upon the circuit court bench could not earn vastly more than the salary he is now paid or that it is proposed to pay in this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then why does he take the place?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Mississippi asks why judges take such places. It is because it now is, and always has been, a very honorable place, and it is to the honor of the profession that that is the fact.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That answers the question.

Mr. KELLOGG. But we should not force men to take those positions simply because of the honor involved, for it means that a poor man can not afford to do so, and the bench will be filled by rich men or by incompetents.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator pardon me this interruption?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it be true that a man takes the place partially because of its compensation and partially because of its honor, and chiefly because of its honor, then why should we put it upon a mere monetary basis? Why should we not leave to the honor of the profession some of the ambition that Marshall, Kent, and Story had to figure in American history as great lawyers? Why should we reduce it to a mere dollars-and-cents standard? As I understand, the Senator from Minnesota says that these men take these places because of the honor in them. I can understand that; he can understand that; the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] can understand that. We will do much more for honor than we will for money.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I will attempt to answer the Senator from Mississippi. It undoubtedly is a fact that a great many of the judges occupy the position because it is a position of honor and dignity, and I do not expect that we are going to pay a salary anywhere near what those men could earn in their profession; no one thinks of doing that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator pardon one more question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have not yet answered the Senator's first question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the Senator can answer the two questions at the same time. Suppose we undertook to pay the utmost salary that any lawyer in private practice could get, then would we not undertake to pay a dishonest salary for dishonest service to public corporations?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, no one thinks of paying a maximum salary equal to the income of many lawyers; but I should like to remind the Senator from Mississippi that there are a great many high-minded and able lawyers who are just as patriotic as is the Senator from Mississippi or any other Senator in this body, who have large incomes from legitimate and honorable business. No one expects to pay judges more than a small proportion of the income of such lawyers; but I do think that we should not leave the judges of the United States courts to be paid by honor alone. I do not wish only men to be selected for those positions who have made their fortunes. I like to see young men of ability who are poor and yet have the world before them given an opportunity to distinguish themselves upon the bench.

Manifestly the salaries of the district and circuit judges of this country are inadequate. Let me submit some figures. The eighth circuit, in which I have had the honor of practicing for over 40 years, contains 13 States, reaching from the Mississippi River to the Rocky Mountains and from the borders of this country on the north to the south to New Mexico. It has a population of almost 20,000,000; it has four United States circuit judges who sit in the court of appeals, and since the day that Justice Miller and Justice Brewer added luster to that bench it has been filled by lawyers of the highest ability, character, and standing. One of them to-day is upon the United States Supreme Court bench, having sat there many years. Judge Caldwell was well known as one of the great lawyers of this country, and Judge Miller in his day was ex officio circuit judge, representing the Supreme Court of the United States. To-day there are Judges Sanborn, Hook, Smith, and Stone. They are all men of ability and character. Judge Sanborn has been on that bench for more than a quarter of a century and is one of the great lawyers and judges of this country, his entire time and strength being given to a work of colossal magnitude. We are paying him only $7,000 a year, and he would have resigned but for the protest of the members of the bar of this country. I say that that is not fair.

Mr. President, the judiciary, State and Federal, is the corner stone and the foundation of law and order in this Republic. It sits between the legislative and the executive. Its powerful hand protects the citizen if the Executive, in the pursuit of his ambitions, seeks to usurp his powers; and it is the prerogative of the judge to decide whether the statutes that Congress pass conform with the Constitution and the Bill of Rights which were framed by our forefathers and which have been handed down to us through the generations. Nothing is more important to the protection of the citizen and to the stability of the Government than a high-minded, honorable, fearless judiciary.

I do not for a moment wish that we shall turn the bench into a money-grubbing profession. I say, to the honor of the bench of this country, that against its standing that charge can never be made; and the proposed increase here provided certainly will not render the judges of the United States liable to the charge of profiteering.

Mr. President, I am not particular whether the amendment of the Judiciary Committee be adopted or whether there be a flat increase applying to all the judges of the United States. I realize that there are objections to both systems. The House Judiciary Committee for the last year or two had under consideration, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has stated, this plan, and they reported in favor of it. Then the House changed it to a flat salary basis. The Senate Judiciary subcommittee recommended a flat increase of salary, but the entire Judiciary Committee, considering the matter again, recommended the sliding scale, with a maximum and a minimum limitation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to have the judgment of the Senator from Minnesota as to which, in his opinion, as the matter now stands, is the better legislation. My view of the bill leads me to feel that the House as it passed the bill came nearer to being absolutely fair all along the line. The plan of the House impresses me as being preferable to that of the bill as reported to the Senate. I have great confidence in the judgment of the Senator from Minnesota in the matter, and should be somewhat led by his mature judgment as to which of these plans is the better; but at present I am convinced that the bill as it came from the other House is much better than as now proposed to be amended by the Senate committee.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I will try to answer the Senator from Arizona before I complete my remarks. I wish to state the two sides of the question as fairly as possible, and I shall be content whichever plan the Senate adopts. I think, however, that the salaries fixed in the House bill are not high enough. As I understand, they are $7,500 for district judges and $8,500 for circuit judges. I think those salaries should be higher.

Coming, now, to the question of which is the better plan, the one adopted by the other House or the one adopted by the Senate Judiciary Committee, reversing the position, as I understand, taken by the subcommittee of the Judiciary committee. I am not on the Judiciary Committee and therefore am not familiar with the arguments and statistics which were presented as to the various large centers of population, and I can only give my views in a general way. It is true, undoubtedly, that in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, and other cities it is much more difficult to obtain high-grade lawyers to sit upon the district bench than it is in the country lawyers of equal ability.

I am a great believer in the country lawyer. I was born in the country, started to practice in a little country town in southern Minnesota, and traveled over the prairies of the West trying lawsuits, and I know that many, if not most, of the great lawyers of the United States have come from country towns. If you will look at the bar of the great cities to-day, you will find that they have drawn their brains largely from the country. I also know that a salary of six, seven, or eight thousand dollars a year in Iowa or Minnesota or in the Dakotas would be much more adequate than $10,000 in New York City or Washington, where rents are enormous and where the standard of professional incomes is very much higher.

Of course, a lawyer should not look exclusively to the money question, and the great lawyers of the country do not. It is a rule almost universal that the great lawyers of this country do not turn away clients any more than the great doctors do because they have no money; but it is not dishonorable for the great lawyers of the country to earn large incomes, any more than it is dishonorable for men engaged in business to make large incomes; it is honorable.

Mr. President, as I have stated, it is true that in the large cities it is more difficult to obtain professional men to sit upon the bench than in the country, and there is a reason for it. In my State we pay our district judges, our State trial judges, $1,500 more in St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Duluth than we pay them elsewhere in the State, and there has never been any objection to that. In the State of New York likewise the State judges get a great deal more—I think nearly twice as much—in the city of New York than they do up State, where I lived when I was a boy. On the other hand, it is also true, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, that there are discriminations in this system. I will admit that as between the State of Minnesota and the State of Iowa I do not think that the judges of the district courts ought to be paid any more in the State of Minnesota than in the State of Iowa, although possibly litigation is greater in Minnesota, owing to the enormous mining district which is situated principally in that State. There will be some discrimination and it can not be avoided. Even if we make a flat increase in salary, there will be discrimination; there is no doubt about that; and under such a plan the discrimination might be greater.

Take the judges of the circuit court of appeals. The circuit court of appeals of the eighth circuit embraces 13 States. There is no other court embracing anywhere near so large a number of States. It has the largest population by about 7,000,000 of any circuit in the United States. It has nearly 20,000,000 people, while the circuit with the next greatest population is the New York circuit, known as the second circuit, which has 12,500,000 people; next comes the Pennsylvania, or third circuit, which has twelve and a third million people; and then the seventh circuit, embracing Wisconsin, Illinois, and Indiana, which has 11,800,000 people. I ask to include the computation I hold in my hand at the end of my remarks, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, under this bill the United States circuit judges of the court of appeals of the first circuit, embracing New England; of the second circuit, embracing Vermont, New York, and Connecticut; and of the third circuit, embracing Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, will get the maximum salary of $10,000, which is certainly not more than adequate. The judges of the seventh circuit, embracing Wisconsin and Illinois and Indiana, in which the city of Chicago is situated, will also receive a salary of $10,000.

In the circuit of which Minnesota is a part, as I figure it—and I think I am correct—the maximum salary of the judges of the United States circuit court of appeals will be $9,500. I readily realize that when those judges sit in St. Paul, St. Louis, Denver, where litigation is perhaps heavier than in any other circuit in the United States, they ought to be paid as much as the judges of the circuit court of appeals in the New York circuit, but I am not going to object to the bill on that account, for I realize that we can not get exact equality, and, even if we provide a flat increase of salary, some judges in the country districts, where the business is light, will be paid really more than the judges in the big districts, where the business is heavy.

In the eighth circuit, during the life of the court, there have been more opinions filed than in any other court in the United States; the litigation has been of greater importance; it has involved a great section of the country traversed by railroads, embracing great cities and great mining and industrial interests, the principal iron mines and many of the other mineral industries of the country being situated within that circuit. Yet I am not going to object because the judges of that circuit under this bill will receive $500 a year less than the judges in the New York and other circuits, because I believe the committee has tried to make as fair a bill as possible. Personally, I am perfectly willing, if the Senate so desires, to have adopted the plan of a flat increase of salary.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator know of any reason why the committee should not have adopted the rule of population in the case of the circuits as well as in the case of the districts?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I am not familiar with the statistics or the arguments before the committee. As I have said, I am not on the committee, and I have had only a very brief opportunity to look over the report of the committee and the bill. I repeat, it is a question of opinion as to which is the best method, and I am sure the chairman of the committee will be perfectly satisfied if either plan is adopted, provided a reasonable increase in the salaries of these judges is provided.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am just as much in favor of a fair increase in the compensation of United States judges as is the Senator in charge of the bill or the Senator from Minnesota, but I can tell the Senator why the rule of population was not adopted with respect to the circuit judges.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The committee was trying to provide, as was stated by the Senator from Georgia, the highest salary for United States judges in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago, and the rule of population will do that in the case of district judges, but will not do it in the case of circuit judges. Therefore, another rule was adopted for ascertaining the compensation of circuit judges. I think the rule eminently unfair, not that I am not willing to give some compensation to the judges in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago in excess of the general level of compensation, for I am. I recognize as perfectly valid some reasons, at any rate, that are given for higher salaries in those places. All of the judges want their salaries increased, of course, but this bill will bring about more heartburnings than we have ever seen in judicial circles.

I see the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] sitting by me. The bill will not only create disparity between States, but between districts in the same State. A few moments ago I asked the Senator from Michigan what the effect of the bill would be in his State, and he told me that the result would be that the salary of the judge of the western district of Michigan would be $7,500, while the salary of the judge of the eastern district of Michigan would be $8,500, both of them men of the very highest character, both of them capable of great work, and one of them doing just as much work and just as important work as the other. I do not believe there is any justification for that kind of a rule.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I can not answer the Senator as to specific salaries in the case of the various district judges of the country. I know, of course, that there is some discrimination between the judges of the circuit court of appeals. Of course, that could be removed by making a flat increase in the salaries of all judges of the circuit court of appeals to $10,000 a year, because undoubtedly in all the circuits the courts of appeal hold their meetings in more than one place. I presume that is true; they certainly do in the circuit where my home is.

So far as I know I have not heard of any objection by the judges themselves; naturally, perhaps, they would not raise objections; but I have heard from a good many judges who, while they realize that the bill probably does discriminate somewhat, yet on the whole they are satisfied, and some of those judges are in the big cities. Of course, however, I can not speak for the bench as a whole, and I realize what the Senator from Iowa has said that there is necessarily some discrimination.

N. B.—The foregoing figures have been obtained from the Census Bureau, and represent estimates of the population of the States mentioned on July 1, 1919, computed on a mathematical basis, being advanced from the last census statistics taken on April 15, 1910.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the salary of a Senator of the United States is $7,500 a year. A Senator of the United States is selected by the people of his State. His source of authority is of the very highest order. A judge of a Federal court is generally selected by some political influence, plus the President and the Attorney General. His source of authority is not of the very highest order. If a Senator does his duty, he does very much more work than a judge of a Federal court. Of course, if a Senator does not do his duty, he may do a good deal less than some judges of some Federal courts. He could not possibly, no matter how much he played, do less work than some other judges of some other Federal courts. There is no reason in the world why an officer of this Government—and the legislative branch of the Government coordinates with the judiciary—should be paid less than the judiciary, except upon the Supreme Court itself, which sits in judgment over both the judiciary and the legislative and the executive branches.

Suppose somebody came in here to-day and said that we ought to fix our salaries as Senators according to the population of our respective States, or according to their wealth, or according to their business. Would you pay a Senator from New York ten times as much as you pay a Senator from Minnesota? If you were guided by the population ratio, or by the wealth ratio, you would have to pay him at least that much more. Is there any sense in it? Are there any ethics in it? And I want to go back to the ethics of the situation.

I repeat now what I have said by innuendo, that if you attempt to pay men upon the Federal bench the salaries that unscrupulous lawyers can gain off the bench, then you have corrupted the bench; and when I say that, I do not mean scrupulous lawyers; I mean unscrupulous lawyers. Every time this question is presented for debate in this body or at the other wing of this Capitol men mention the immense salaries that certain lawyers are getting.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, did I mention the immense salaries that certain lawyers were getting?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator did not mention any particular salary that any particular lawyer was getting; no.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did I mention any salaries at all?

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator went on and mentioned the fact that the judges could not get as much as they could in private life.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is a mild statement of the position I took.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. Now, what the Senator meant by that was that the judges could not get as much as some lawyers could get in private life. If he had referred to Chief Justice Marshall, or to Justice Kent, of New York, or to Story, they got a great deal more as salary than they ever earned as practitioners; but they did not get as much as a whole lot of other lawyers in their day got—the lawyers that took business that Kent or Story or Marshall would have scorned.

What about this basis of population with regard to salaries for judges? Are you going to give a Senator from Pennsylvania five times the salary that a Senator from Georgia gets? They do the same work, or are supposed to do it. Every judge of the appellate court and every circuit judge and every district judge of the United States has business enough to keep him busy all the time if he attends to his work. Why should you discriminate between them on account of the population behind them? And if it be true that you are discriminating, not on account of population, but on account of the number of cases, then why not increase the number of judges and let each judge have approximately the same business to perform and pay him the same salary?

But at the bottom of it all, Mr. President, there are, to me, the ethics of the situation. I deny, I scorn the proposition, that a man honored with a life tenure as an officer of the United States Government for the purpose of construing its laws ought to want or demand the same compensation that he would receive in private life. You would give up the position that you occupy to-day, and I would give up mine, for a position for life upon the Federal bench, and the Senator from Minnesota would give up his. Why? The honor, the dignity, the patriotism, the service, the life service of a true and honest man rendered to his country.

What is there in life after all except service—service which I render you, or you me, or which we both render the public? The balance of it is selfishness. You show me a lawyer who would not take a place upon the Federal bench for life at $6,000 a year rather than earn $15,000 in private life and I will show you a man that is crooked, in heart crooked, in soul crooked, in mind crooked, because he has at heart the idea that the amount of money that he can earn is of more worth to God and man than the amount of service that he can render.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, in what little I have to say I shall not stop to answer anything that has been said about the legal profession by the Senator from Mississippi, for I do not know that it has anything to do with this case; but I have learned to-day for the first time, and from him, that the best way to get a good lawyer upon the bench is to get a man who never was able to make a living practicing that honorable profession; and the way to secure an absolutely perfect judge is not to allow him any salary at all. [Laughter.] That is idealistic in the highest degree, and as practical as real simonpure idealists usually are.

I want to say that as far as this discussion has gone—and I am deeply interested in it, though not personally, any more than any other Senator here—I feel that we ought to accept the House bill. It shortens further debate on this question and gives, in my judgment, as good a law as we can possibly get out of the present condition. I do not think there was any justification in the Senate committee striking out the $7,500 placed in the House bill in section 2 and substituting $7,000 per annum as the minimum salary, and doing it, I imagine, on the ground of population of the district rather than on the labor to be performed by the judge. It so happens that there are many districts in the United States where $6,000 might be a sufficient salary, a fair compensation for the service rendered; and from what has just been said by the Senator from Mississippi, I would judge that inasmuch as little men were hunting big places, even with the smallest salaries, many of the judges with whom he is acquainted were getting much more than they ought to have, even at $5,000. In such cases the Federal courts in such States should be confined to not more than one district, and I will agree with the Senator to limit the salary to the value of the service rendered at any time that he will introduce a bill to that effect. Mr. President, no law of man was ever made or ever can be made that will insure exact justice to all concerned. In our limited conditions we can only try our best to approach that exact justice we all desire. Because a Mississippi judge has nothing to do and can regale himself and live in envious splendor on $6,000 a year is no reason that a busy and able public servant in my State should be worked to death on starving wages.

Take the judge of my district—Judge Sawtelle—an ornament to the bench, a man of the highest personal character, and a lawyer of exceptional ability, a man whose life is as clean as his mind is honest, and who is absolutely fearless in the performance of his duty. When comparatively a young man he quit a practice of twelve or fifteen thousand dollars a year to take the position of district judge at $6,000. Men have ambition, just as many of us started out, actuated by it, not as a money-getting matter but feeling that probably he could render such service to his country as to be honored and respected by his contemporaries and leave a name that his descendants would revere. Nevertheless the judge or the Senator must have something to live on. The judge can not educate his boys on his present salary and hold four terms of court in a State almost as big as Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois put together, going hundreds of miles from one court to another, six years on the bench now without a week's actual recess, trying cases at night, with a docket constantly growing, and disposing of something like 500 cases since last March, and he has 600 cases now on his docket. He has to do this, and he does it and is doing it simply because he can not possibly enjoy a recess with 100 or 200 people in jail awaiting trial.

We have asked for a second judge for that district. For the reasons that I indicated in the few words I said a while ago, that judge has not yet been granted. That bill, which passed the Senate, has not passed the House. They are trying to mix it up with politics. Politics has nothing to do with it. Telegrams or letters sent here to Members of the House and Senate by low and common ward politicians are unworthy of decent consideration at your hands. The judge of my district can not perform the duties of his office and keep his health, and no man living can do it. With possibly one or two exceptions, there is not in this Senate a man who works half the time that Judge Sawtelle works in Arizona upon the bench, and I know that his services to his country there are as great as the services of any one of us here; and yet the Senate has cut that salary down to $500 less than the House bill provided and largely increased the salary of judges doing less work, but serving in districts having a larger population.

There are ten cases coming before the Arizona district judge to where one case is heard in many other districts, especially in some States of the South and in the New England States. Unnecessary courts should be abolished and the remaining judges given a fair pay for their highly specialized and valuable service. If there ever was a time when men of learning, men of courage, men of character, men of justice and patriotism, should occupy the bench it is now. Whatever may be said to the contrary, the courts of our country, with some disgraceful exceptions, have held the fairly balanced scales of justice. I have no patience with those who talk about "lawyer-made laws for benefit of lawyers." Show me in all the acts of Congress one single law justifying that scandal. Whenever you hear on the streets or in political or other gatherings some blatant orator deriding the laws of the land, the courts of justice, put him down as an enemy to decent government, an opponent of modern civilization, and in essence a traitor to the country his presence pollutes. We need on the bench the highest character of men that can be secured—men of learning, experience, wisdom, sound judgment, unafraid in performance of duty; but such men can not be had at salaries that will not educate their boys and girls and afford a home for the mother. My record shows my willingness to accord to every man who works with hand or brain a fair compensation for the labor performed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I had assumed that every sober-minded Senator was in favor of increasing the salaries of Federal judges. I think we have all had knowledge of conditions in our own districts, so that we know something of the work that is done by and the duties that are required of a Federal judge.

With me, it is not a question as to how much these men could earn in private life. It is simply a matter of what it is right for the Government to pay its judicial servants. What ought the judges to receive as a minimum salary for the services which they render the country?

Considering what the States have done in the payment of their judges, it does not seem to me that the salaries of Federal judges, district and circuit, are high enough. I am, however, better pleased with the House provision than I am with the Senate amendment, although I would like to see the salaries still higher than those provided by the House. I would like to provide a flat salary of $8,000 for the judges. My reason for that, among others, is that every judge devotes his whole time to the duties of his office, and most of our judges are already overworked. Furthermore, they are frequently assigned in exchange with other judges in other circuits, and it frequently happens that a judge sits for months in a district outside of the one over which he presides.

For instance, a judge in Michigan is sometimes assigned to a circuit or district in New York City. He goes down there and serves, performs there the same duties that he performs at home, and the same duties that are performed by the local judge. It seems to me there can be no reason why men who do exactly the same work, and possibly in the same circuit during a portion of their term, should receive different salaries.

Therefore, Mr. President, without attempting to answer any of the arguments that have been made against raising the salaries, and without attempting to laud the judiciary, for which I have the very greatest respect, but coming back to my original proposition—namely, that most men who are familiar with the circumstances believe that the judges are not receiving enough—it seems to me the only questions for us to decide are how much shall be the minimum salary and whether the salary shall be graded according to population or whether it shall be the same for all.

I think the minimum ought to be $8,000, and I think every judge who is on the district bench should receive that salary. As for the circuit judges, I am not particular whether you make the salary $9,000 or $10,000; but, in my judgment, it ought to be the same for all. We pay Senators and Members of the House not according to the population of the States or districts which they represent but all receive the same, because they are supposed to perform the same duties and meet the same responsibilities.

Therefore, I shall feel that it is best to vote against the Senate amendment, with the hope that we can raise the House provision to $8,000 a year for district judges and $10,000 for circuit judges.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has taken an interest in the subject matter of the amendment to the committee amendment which I have just offered, to wit, the salaries of the United States district judges for the Territory of Hawaii. He has a communication on the subject from the Attorney General of the United States which he intended to present and ask to have read. As he is not present for the moment, I make the request for him. I send the communication to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1919.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I acknowledge receipt of yours of the 4th, suggesting that the bill increasing the salaries of Federal judges be amended so as to include territorial judges.

I not only see no objection to the raising of these salaries, but believe it would be well to do so. Judges are almost universally underpaid in this country. As the bill referred to is now pending in the Senate, I suggest that you have it amended so as to carry out your views. It is very difficult for me to keep up with legislation of this character, and under existing conditions in my department it is hardly possible.

Yours, very truly,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I am very thankful to the Senator from Montana for having sent the letter to the desk. I was out of the Chamber temporarily, or else I would have sent it up myself.

I wish to say that the amendment strikes me as being eminently fair and eminently just, and I hope the Senator from Georgia will accept it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Montana be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of line 16, after the word "judges," it is proposed to insert "including the United States district judges for the Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Montana if he would object to amending that amendment by including Porto Rico? They are all on exactly the same basis.

Mr. MYERS. I do not know anything about the salary of the United States district judge for the Territory of Porto Rico. What is it—$6,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think he gets $5,000, but he does exactly the same class of service, and Porto Rico is on exactly the same basis of salary.

Mr. MYERS. No; I would have no objection to including Porto Rico.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, would the Senator object to withholding that amendment for the present and letting us see what is the fate of the amendment of the Senator from Montana?

Porto Rico is in the first circuit, the circuit in which I reside and where I practice law. If the amendment of the Senator from Montana should prevail I intended to offer an amendment putting in Porto Rico, but I should hate to hurt the Senator's amendment by coupling it with another one. I would rather have them separate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no desire to do so, and therefore I asked the Senator if he was willing to consent. As the Senator from New Hampshire intends to offer an amendment on the subject, I will not press my suggestion at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I trust that Senators who want to enlarge the scope of this bill will not overlook Alaska.

Mr. MYERS. The United States district judge for the Territory of Alaska, I understand, receives $7,500 per year. I then simply ask for a vote on my amendment as I sent it to the desk, and as it reads now, applying to the Territory of Hawaii alone.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I favor the legislation in this bill. I think it proper to increase the salaries of our Federal judges; but, like the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and some others who have discussed this subject, I am inclined to think that the House bill is the better bill.

I doubt the wisdom of legislating according to population. I think it is rather unfair to the judges who do not live in the populous districts, who may have just as much work to do as those who do live in the populous districts, to pay them a different salary. I think it is wrong in principle. It is contrary to the policies along which we usually operate, and for that reason I hope very much that the Senator from Arizona will insist upon his motion to strike out section 2 as proposed by the committee and restore the provision of the House bill which increases the salaries to $7,500 a year for district judges, and to $8,500 a year for circuit judges.

I think these increases should be made. I think they should be uniform. I think we should treat all judges alike. Why, as we know, these judges constantly sit by interchange. Judges from my State frequently sit in Ohio, New York, and other more populous States. They would be sitting there and doing the work of their colleagues at a less salary under those circumstances.

The proposal of the committee is an unfair method of determining salaries, as it seems to me. I should like to see all treated equally and fairly alike, especially those in the same class. That is all I have to say about that. I think their salaries ought to be equalized. I will vote for the salaries as provided in the bill as passed by the House. I would much prefer that method of dealing with the question. The method provided in the committee amendment will be the cause of much complaint from the judges holding the same positions in the less populous districts and receiving less salaries. One other matter before I take my seat, Mr. President. I think the salaries of the supreme court judges of the District should be made the same as the salaries of district judges, and that the salaries of judges of the Court of Appeals of the District should be made the same as the salaries of the circuit judges. The work in each case corresponds, and the salaries should be arranged accordingly. This is only fair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that when these judges are sent out of their districts away from their homes, they receive transportation and $10 per diem extra pay, which, in a way, if applied to the entire year, would amount to something like $3,000. This, of course, is some compensation to those judges from the smaller districts, who go to the larger districts to help attend to the business there.

I mention this simply to remind the Senate of the fact and to state again that I am not a partisan of either plan. They seem to be so nearly the same that I would be glad to have either. We only finally adopted the graduated scale, because we thought some substantial recognition should be made of the status in the big cities, and that in this way alone we could succeed in reaching it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one word more and then I will yield the floor to the Senator. I mention again that the district attorneys receive different salaries in different districts, even in the same State, and United States marshals receive different salaries. The theory that everyone occupying a particular office must receive the same salary everywhere has not been followed. Indeed, until a few years ago the district judges in different parts of the United States received different salaries, just as in some of the States the nisi prius judges receive larger salaries in the large cities than they do in the rural districts. I have no doubt it is based upon the theory that to obtain the talent you want you ought to recognize the earning power of the person called to the particular position. You must consider the earning capacity of the person at the place where he is located and also the expense of living.

I deemed it due to the committee that I should say this much as presenting the line of thought which influenced the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the Senator takes his seat, may I ask him a question? Does not the Senator think the scale of difference, if I may call it that, between $7,500 and $9,000 is too small to be taken into consideration in the settlement of the salaries of these judges? In other words, take a lawyer from New York, who is about to be appointed to a judgeship, who has to give up a very large practice, does the Senator think it would make very much difference to him whether he received a salary of $7,500 or $9,000?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He might take the place without regard to the salary for the honor in the position and his desire to render the public a service, but the $2,000 would help substantially in meeting his expenses each year, even in New York, and even here in Washington.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it seems to me there is an improper distinction made in the payment of judges when it is based on population. I know something of the conditions in the eastern and northeastern sections of the country, and I think it is very proper that I should call the attention of the Senate to the condition in my own district. Of course, the judge in our district will get the smallest salary, on the basis of population. At the same time the judge in our district is sitting on the bench all over the populous State of Pennsylvania, helping the judges who are receiving the higher salary in Pennsylvania, possibly as high as the salary received by judges anywhere in the United States.

I fancy that in the three States, in the third circuit—New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware—and in all the districts of that circuit there arise as important cases, as complex questions for decision, and we need as good judges as anywhere else in the United States. Those judges practically divide up their work.

It seems to me a bit humiliating for a judge in one of the smaller districts to have to make out his per diem account, his traveling expenses, and things of that sort. So far as we are concerned in that section of the country, certainly in the third district, it seems to me, any distinction, while it may be a bit humiliating, is absolutely useless and uncalled for.

I shall vote for the House provision making them all equal, and I fancy that even in those districts where by reason of sparse population the judges would go on the smaller salaries, yet the judges in those districts having to travel long distances and put up with inconveniences are entitled to quite as much consideration as are the judges in thickly settled districts.

It seems to me the House provision, under the circumstances, is the best. I do not think there is any danger of overpaying our judges anywhere, certainly not in this portion of the country, where it is almost always a sacrifice to any lawyer who is fit to be a judge to go on the bench, so far as the pecuniary consideration is concerned.

I hope no distinction will be made in regard to population. I shall vote against it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order now to move to strike out section 2 of the bill and insert section 2 as agreed to by the House?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The parliamentary status is this——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been answered by the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not hear the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair said it was not in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to offer the amendment when it is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the only district court not now on the same basis as the others is the district court of Porto Rico, which is in the first circuit. I am not acquainted with the judge. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] tells me he is a fine judge and a fine man. I believe it is the temper of the Senate, if we can judge from the speeches, that all these judges should be put upon the same scale. I shall certainly vote for that, and hope it may be adopted.

In order that the court in Porto Rico may not be the only one left with a smaller salary, I move in the Senate Committee bill as amended, after the word "Hawaii," to insert the words "and Porto Rico."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think it is desirable, if it were possible, to put all the judges upon the same basis, but the question is how to do that. Paying all the judges the same salary does not do it, because the cost of living varies so tremendously in the different districts. I am not informed as to what the cost of living of the judge in Porto Rico will be, but it is perfectly evident that it costs the Federal judge in one of the large metropolitan cities of the country much more to live than it does the judge in a small community. I do not know that the increase of the compensation of judges in proportion to the population of the district would be a fair measure as indicating the difference in the cost of living. I do agree, however, that, as a general rule, the salaries of all of the Federal judges should be increased. I know personally of instances where various Federal judges have been compelled to resign their office because they could not meet their family expenses. It is perfectly evident that a Federal judge who happens to reside in a country village, who happens to own a farm or be in the neighborhood of farms, where a great deal of the products come from, and has a modest house, if his salary is increased to $9,000, say, and the judge in a metropolitan city is left at $9,000, the judge in the smaller locality has a great advantage. It is not what is paid the man, it is what he can save out of his salary, if anything, that indicates whether he is overpaid or not.

I am in some doubt whether to vote for the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate or the House provision. It is impossible in a place like New York for a judge to lease a proper residence for himself and family for less than six or seven thousand dollars a year, which leaves him nothing at all with which to support his family.

It is easy enough for people to talk about rascally lawyers being judges, and so forth. Of course, if there are such, the executive branch of the Government and the Senate that confirms them are responsible for such judges, but there is not one in a million whoever becomes a Federal judge who is an improper character. The judges should be paid proper salaries. There are many Federal judges to-day who, at the small amount paid them, six or seven thousand dollars, or whatever it may be, if they left the bench, would make $100,000 a year in the locality where they are situated. They are simply detained upon the bench by the desire to occupy the honorable position afforded and by a feeling that they can render good service to their country.

I hope, whatever action the Senate takes, which will throw the matter into conference, that salaries at least as high as proposed by the House, and I hope higher, may finally be the outcome of this legislation. Ten thousand dollars a year would certainly not be excessive compensation for a circuit judge or a district judge of the United States.

It has been stated that in New York City the police magistrates get $12,000 a year, and the supreme court judges, who are not judges of the highest court in that State, get $17.500 a year; and the great United States Government, with tremendous questions coming before the Federal judiciary, pays its judges less than half what the judges get in the State of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I do not understand from the way the bill is printed how far we are considering the Senate committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are considering the amendment on page 3, line 21.

Mr. HOLLIS. Why is not all in italics on pages 2, 3, and 4 a part of the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is.

Mr. HOLLIS. But we have been considering it piecemeal. That is entirely satisfactory, if it is understood.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think we have read the entire paragraph down to section 3.

Mr. THOMAS. I think we had better consider it section by section.

Mr. HOLLIS. I agree to that; but I want it understood, because I have an amendment to offer to section 4 when it is reached.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The apparent confusion about the sections is that section 2 contains certain sections of the Judicial Code, and from line 16, page 2, down to line 6, page 5, you have but one section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the vote first comes on this question: The original bill as it came from the House, down to line 15, on page 3. That is the part that the Senate committee amended. It undoubtedly goes to line 5, on page 5.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then the Senate committee amendment must be first perfected before the question of substitution arises. I desire to offer two amendments on page 4. I do this at the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] who has been obliged to leave the Chamber. The purpose of the amendment is to make sure that the judges of the old court of commerce shall be included with the other circuit judges. It will be recalled by the Senate that a few years ago the court of commerce, which handled appeals from the Interstate Commerce Commission, was abolished, but that the members of that court were continued as circuit judges and are now assigned to do circuit judge work in different parts of the country, and that they are doing it to the satisfaction of all concerned.

I think it is the intention of the Judiciary Committee to see that they are given the same increase in salary that other circuit judges get. In order to make that certain I will offer two amendments. On page 4 of the bill as printed, line 14, I move to strike out the word "the" before the word "circuit," and on the same page, line 19, after the word "appointed," I move to insert the words "or to which they may be assigned during the period of their assignment, respectively."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLLIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It will be moved by some one to strike out the whole Senate committee amendment, and I would suggest to the Senator the propriety of reserving his amendment until the vote is taken on whether this amendment to the whole section should be stricken out or not.

Mr. HOLLIS. In case the Senate committee amendment is adopted, which I think it will not be, it will be too late for my amendment. We must first perfect the part to be substituted before we vote on whether to substitute it, and I am endeavoring to perfect it in case we should be outvoted. I am quite sure that is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Suppose we vote upon it, and after we put the amendment in we strike out section 2 as amended?

Mr. HOLLIS. My understanding is that if the Senate committee amendment as amended is adopted it will then be too late to offer further amendments to that amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You could offer the amendment to the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. I understand not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. As a separate section.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am supposing that the Senate committee amendment is adopted over our wish.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question in regard to his amendment, with which I am in entire accord? Does not that need to be put into the original section also to perfect the text of the House bill?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am going to offer a similar amendment to take care of it before we vote on the substitute in the Senate. I intend to do that, but the phraseology will have to be different.

Mr. LODGE. It is desirable to perfect them both.

Mr. HOLLIS. I shall do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not fully understand the amendment just offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. I wish he would explain it to me a little further.

Mr. HOLLIS. On page 4, line 14, at the beginning of the sentence, the words "The circuit judges shall receive" might be construed to mean the circuit judges who had been mentioned before. By striking out the word "the" all circuit judges are included, and that would include the judges who are now serving as circuit judges. Then their salary is to be dependent upon the salary allowed circuit judges in the circuit to which they happen to be assigned. For instance, if they are assigned to the New York circuit, they get the New York circuit pay. If they are assigned to some other circuit, they get the pay of that circuit. That is my understanding.

Mr. CUMMINS. The salary might be changed then from month to month or year to year.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; and that shows the inconsistency of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If the committee amendment is rejected, will the House text be open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not of that opinion. It is open to amendment now. It is open first to amendment. The rule is that where there is a motion to strike out and insert, the portion to be stricken out is open to amendment and the portion to be inserted is open to amendment, and the part to be stricken out is first open to amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not question the ruling of the Chair, but I am very anxious that those who have offered amendments to the committee amendment, the amendment relating to Hawaii and the amendment relating to Porto Rico and now relating to the four unassigned circuit judges, will offer their amendments also to the original text, so that we can have a fair vote as between the committee plan of adjusting salaries and the plan the House has adopted. I commend that to the Senators who have offered those amendments.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am quite sure the practice has been in the Senate for the past few years to hold that either the part to be inserted or the substitute may be amended at any time before the vote is taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about that. The only point is when two Senators are insisting upon an amendment, one to the original text and the other to the substitute, the amendment to the original text is first in order.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is my recollection about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about that. The Senator's amendment to the amendment is in order, and the question is on agreeing to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish now to offer an amendment. On page 2, line 5, I move to strike out the word "they" and to insert "all circuit judges." That will have the effect of including the four circuit judges at large, so to speak.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. Now, to take care of Hawaii and Porto Rico in the original text, on page 1 of the bill as printed, line 7, after the word "judges," I move to insert "including the district judges of Porto Rico and Hawaii."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know exactly the nature of the courts in Hawaii or Porto Rico. I know that under the Territorial law there was no such thing as a United States district court or a United States circuit court; but the appointee of the President exercised jurisdiction of the Federal and district courts, and they were at the same time the judges of courts of original jurisdiction under the Territorial law. If this is confined to district judges and they are not in fact district judges, it might show some little lack of investigation as far as we are concerned in passing the act.

Mr. THOMAS. I would suggest, then, to the Senator from New Hampshire, in view of what the Senator from Arizona has said, that his amendment be changed so as to read:

And the United States judges in Porto Rico and Hawaii.

If they are not district judges, certainly they are United States judges.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. "Judges exercising Federal jurisdiction." It seems to me that might be better. They might be district judges for aught I know.

Mr. THOMAS. It all depends upon the phraseology of the act creating the Territories of Hawaii and Porto Rico.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Exactly.

Mr. HOLLIS. Following that suggestion, I will change the amendment. I move to insert after the word "judges" in the seventh line, page 1, the words "including judges in Porto Rico and Hawaii exercising Federal jurisdiction." I think that will cover it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to amend by striking out on line 8, page 1, in the House text, the figures "$7,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$9,000"; and by striking out in line 6, on page 2, in the House text, "$8,500" and inserting "$10,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am not in favor of these increases at this time. I believe in paying the Federal judiciary well, but I am not prepared to support these increases now. If they are to be made, however, they should be uniformly made, and commensurate with the importance of the courts presided over by the judges to be affected by the bill.

I therefore propose an amendment. On page 5, I move to strike out lines 11, 12, 13, and 14 and to insert the following:

The Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, and each of the associate justices thereof the sum of $9,500 a year, payable monthly. One-half shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from the Treasury of the United States.

I have a memorandum which states——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Why not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Because we are considering another amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. That is a very good reason. When the bill was taken up the Senator having charge of the bill asked unanimous consent to consider the amendments of the committee first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS. Objection was made, and consequently I do not understand that this amendment is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present amendment the Senate is considering——

Mr. THOMAS. If the Chair will allow me another word, I accept the ruling of the Chair and will offer the amendment later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment ends at line 5, on page 5. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I think my general pair, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], would vote as I am about to vote, but, out of an abundance of caution, I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and in view of his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I inquire, Has the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator, and he not being present I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "yea."

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of official business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] is absent from the Senate this afternoon on official business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are detained on official business.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. He seems not to have voted. I therefore transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 45, as follows:

So the committee amendment as amended was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I now wish to renew the motion which I tried to make a few moments ago.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator from Colorado yield for just a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I will.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is an amendment on the table which I had printed a few days ago which I think covers the matter the Senator from Colorado has in mind. If he will allow the Senate committee amendment to be read, and then permit my amendment to be stated, he will see how nearly my amendment conforms to the amendment which he intends to offer.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary to insert as a new section, on page 5, the following:

SEC. 3. That the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries upon the same basis as salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of district courts of the United States, and such salaries shall be paid as now provided by law.

The judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries upon the same basis as the salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of the circuit courts of appeals of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator from Colorado will now allow the Secretary to read my proposed amendment to take the place of section 3, as reported by the committee, he will see how it conforms to his amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to that being done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the committee amendment just stated it is proposed to insert:

That the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall each receive an annual salary of $9,000, and the chief justice of said court shall be paid a salary of $9,500, said salaries to be paid as now provided by law.

The judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall each receive an annual salary of $10,000, and the chief justice of said court shall receive an annual salary of $10,500.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will consent to the substitution of $9,500 for $10,000 in the last clause of his amendment, I will not offer the amendment which I have in mind

Mr. HENDERSON. I will accept that modification of the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, I ask that the memorandum which I send to the desk regarding the amendment be read. I desire to say before taking my seat that I think if this bill is to be enacted at all it should include the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada. For the reasons heretofore stated, however, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the amendment as now proposed to be amended comprehends the amendment which I had already submitted and had printed; and I shall be glad to support the amendment as now offered by the Senator from Nevada, with the modification proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which the Senator from Nevada has accepted. I trust the amendment will be adopted and that the bill containing it will pass.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado has asked that the memorandum which he has sent to the Secretary's desk be read. If there is no objection, it will be read. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

Memorandum. In re H. R. 12001, concerning the increase in the salaries of Federal judges in its relation to the courts of the District of Columbia.

THE BILL AMBIGUOUS.

The Senate Committee on the Judiciary have reported certain amendments to the above-mentioned bill which provide, in effect, that the justices of the "Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries upon the same basis as the salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of the Circuit Courts of Appeals of the United States."

This is ambiguous. The act declares that the circuit judges shall receive $1,000 in excess of the highest salary paid to any of the district judges of the districts comprised within the judicial circuit for which the circuit judges shall be appointed. But there is no district judge in the District of Columbia. How, then, can the salary to be paid to the justices of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia be measured?

DISCRIMINATION.

If we assume that the salary of the justices of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia is to be measured by the salary paid to the justices of the Supreme Court of the District, each would receive only $8,000 a year, while the salary to be paid under the bill to circuit judges in circuits not doing half the work that is done by the court of appeals in this district is $10,000 a year, as will appear in a minute.

THE WORK DONE.

Herewith is a statement showing the number of cases disposed of by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia during the 25 years of its existence and the number of cases disposed of during the same period by the different circuit courts of appeals. This statement was prepared from the reports of the Attorneys General. It shows that the Court of Appeals of the District ranks third in the number of cases disposed of, yet the bill puts it lowest in point of salary.

To the suggestion that the number of cases disposed of by a court is not the correct criterion by which to judge the quantity of business done, because one case may take three weeks or a month to try, while another may be disposed of in a few hours, the answer is (a) that this is not true of appellate courts, for it is a rare thing for such courts to devote more than four hours to the hearing of a case; and (b) it is true of all trial courts. Five months were given to the trial of the Hutchins will case in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, six weeks to the trial of the Hammond-Sully case, and more than a week to the trial of the Godsill case.

Moreover, two of the circuit courts of appeals, for the judges of whom the bill provides $10,000 a year, have four judges, while the District Court of Appeals has only three. Furthermore, it is a matter of common knowledge amongst practitioners that practically every circuit court of appeals in the United States calls in district judges to assist, and that in some circuits it is a rare thing to find more than one circuit judge at a sitting. The court is usually made up of one circuit judge and two district judges, so that in practice nearly all of the circuit courts utilize the services of from 10 to 12 judges. When this is considered, it becomes apparent that the work done by the District Court of Appeals entitles it to be placed at the head and not at the foot of the column.

JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia is broader than that of any circuit court of appeals. It comprehends not only all Federal but also all State jurisdiction. Besides, the court has a special jurisdiction of appeals from the Patent Office and from the action of the Postmaster General in certain matters. The wide scope and practical importance of the court's jurisdiction are further indicated by the fact that it has power to control by mandamus or injunction the actions of the Secretary of the Treasury (Newman v. Moyers, 47 App. D. C., 102), the Secretary of the Interior (United States v. Hitchcock, 190 U. S., 316), and the Interstate Commerce Commission (United States v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 246 U. S., 638). This jurisdiction is often invoked, and at times affects property of great value in different parts of the country.

The decisions of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia are final in substantially the same class of cases as those in which the action of the circuit courts of appeals is final.

THE SALARY OF CHIEF JUSTICES.

Assuming that the bill places the salary of the justices of the District Court of Appeals at $8,000, it will raise each of the associate justices $1,000 and the chief justice only $500. When the court was formed, in 1893, 25 years ago, the salary of the associate justices was fixed at $6,000 per year and that of the chief justice at $6,500 (27 Stat., 434). In 1903, or 10 years afterwards, the salary of each of the associate justices was increased to $7,000 a year and that of the chief justice to $7,500 (32 Stat., 825). The salaries have remained at those figures ever since. The bill wipes out this distinction between the chief justice and associate justices and, as has been observed, raises the salary of the associate justices $1,000 a year, while that of the chief justice is raised only $500.

The chief justice of the Court of Claims, according to the bill, will continue to receive $500 in addition to the salary paid to the associate justices of that court.

The chief justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia receives $500 more than any of his associates (39 Stat., 119).

The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States receives $500 more than any of his associates (32 Stat., 825).

This shows that it has been the legislative custom to pay a chief justice $500 more than his associates.

SUMMARIZATION.

To summarize, the cost of living in the District of Columbia is certainly as high as in any other place in the United States. The volume of business done by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia is more than that of any circuit court of appeals in the United States, save two. The jurisdiction of that court is more comprehensive than that of any circuit court of appeals, and the litigation which comes before it is as important as that with which any circuit court of appeals has to deal. Why, then, should not the salary of the justices of the District Court of Appeals be as high as that of the judges, for instance, of the third circuit or of the first circuit, where the business done is considerably less than in the District of Columbia, as shown by the statement attached hereto.

WHAT WOULD BE FAIR.

The average salary provided in the bill for judges of the circuit court of appeals, as shown by the attached statement, is a little less than $9,500. It would seem that the justices of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia should have at least that, and the chief justice $10,000, or $500 additional, as heretofore.

This could be accomplished by striking out lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, on page 5, and substituting therefor the following:

"The chief justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year and each of the associate justices thereof the sum of $9,500 a year, payable monthly; one-half shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from the Treasury of the United States."

[Compiled from annual reports of the Attorney General.]

	Number of judges.	Cases disposed of 1893 to 1918, inclusive.	Proposed salaries.
Second circuit	4	6,196	$10,000

Seventh circuit	4	2,613	10,000

Court of Appeals, District of Columbia, organized in 1893.

The court opens its October term (1918) with 18 per cent more cases on the calendar than the highest previous year in its history.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have this suggestion to make in reference to increasing the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court and of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. I am ready to accept for the committee an amendment making the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia equal to the salaries of the judges of the district courts of the United States, the two classes of judges occupying very much the same position, and making the salaries of the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District the same as the salaries of the judges of the circuit courts of appeal. This could be done very easily by striking out in line 7 the word "upon," and striking out in line 8 the word "basis," and pursuing the same course in line 12, so that section 3 would then read:

SEC. 3. That the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries the same as salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of district courts of the United States, and such salaries shall be paid as now provided by law.

The judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries the same as the salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of the circuit courts of appeals of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I am very glad to accept that amendment, and I will ask to be allowed to withdraw the amendment I have offered to section 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill how much of an advance of salary will probably be involved as the provision stands now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This modification involves no advance. It depends entirely——

Mr. LEWIS. It really operates as a reduction, does it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It depends entirely upon how section 118 is adopted. It simply puts the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia upon the same basis as district judges and judges of the circuit courts of appeals, respectively. Where those salaries shall finally be left is another question; but I undertake to place the Supreme Court judges of the District, who are really United States district judges, under another name, and the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District, who are really judges of United States circuit courts of appeals under another name, on the same basis as all other district judges and judges of the circuit courts of appeals.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he thinks that the Supreme Court and Court of Appeals judges of the District of Columbia are upon the same basis as a matter of duty and as a matter of dignity with the other judges to whom he has referred?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I think so. The judges of the Supreme Court of the District have all the jurisdiction that is vested in a district judge of the United States, plus the local jurisdiction attaching to them as being charged with the duties ordinarily pertaining to a superior or district court judge of a State. The Court of Appeals of the District has all the jurisdiction of a circuit court of appeals of the United States, and a vast number of important cases come to that court growing out of governmental responsibilities attaching to citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, then, this proposition involves no advance in salary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not unless the salaries of the other judges are advanced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that that proposition is to be later considered by the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is still before the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is to come up before the Senate for subsequent consideration.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia has not only the duties of the ordinary circuit court of appeals but it has a class of business peculiar to itself. It is also the only court to which patent business is referred in case of appeal from the Commissioner of Patents; and in the number of cases disposed of, according to the Report of the Attorney General, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia ranks third among the 9 or 10 circuits of the United States in the amount of business transacted—the number of cases adjudicated.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the inquiry of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] raises a question which I think is important now. I should like to ask whether or not section 1 and section 2 have been adopted as amended? I do not understand that any vote has been taken upon the adoption of those sections as they appear in the House bill as amended. The vote was taken upon the question of striking out the House provision and inserting in lieu thereof section 2, as proposed by the Senate committee amendment, and the amendment of the Senate committee was rejected. There were certain amendments, I believe, adopted to the House provision, but the provision as amended has not been voted on, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We will vote on that when we get to a vote on the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, the status up to this time is that the salary of the district judges is to be fixed at $8,500 a year, as I understand, under the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

Mr. KELLOGG. The salary of district judges is to be $9,000 and of circuit judges $10,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is worse and worse. I think that is a great mistake. I was expecting that the Chair would put the question on the adoption of that provision in the bill as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did, and it was adopted.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought the question was upon the substituting for the House provision the Senate committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was voted down.

Mr. FLETCHER. We refused to do that. But is there not a further question on whether or not section 2 as amended shall be agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was amended before the Senate voted on the substitute. The Senate did vote on the amendment to make the salaries $9,000 and $10,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely want it understood that I think a great mistake was made in doing that. I think it will tend to defeat the whole bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us first dispose of the pending amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon; I thought that it had been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has not been agreed to. The question is on agreeing to section 3 as amended. Without objection, the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment to be inserted on page 6, between lines 3 and 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are two committee amendments prior to that, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 15, it is proposed to change the number of the section from "3" to "4."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 16, after the word "amended," it is proposed to insert the words "so as."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I now ask that my amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 3, it is proposed to insert a new section to be known as section 4½——

Mr. LODGE. The number can be changed if desired.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 4½. That the presiding judge and the associate judges, respectively, of the United States Court of Customs Appeals shall receive salaries equal in amount to the salaries provided by this act to be paid the chief justice and other judges, respectively, of the Court of Claims, payable monthly from the Treasury.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what those salaries are now?

Mr. LODGE. The salaries now are $7,000.

Mr. POMERENE. I refer to the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims.

Mr. LODGE. The salary of the judges of the Court of Claims at this time is $6,500, but that salary is raised by this bill to $7,500, and the salary of the chief justice to $8.000. The increase in the case of the Court of Customs Appeals is much smaller than in the case of the Court of Claims. The judges of the Court of Customs Appeals were originally paid, under the act creating that court, $10,000, which amount was reduced by a provision of the code to $7,000. The amendment I have offered simply puts them on the same basis as the judges of the Court of Claims.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment, save that it was my understanding that when this court was first created it was planned to make the salary of those judges $10,000 a year.

Mr. LODGE. That was provided in the organic act creating the court.

Mr. POMERENE. That was done when the court was first created?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, afterwards, they were reduced in order to keep the salaries of the judges of that court on an equality with the salaries of the circuit judges?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. The only objection I have to the Senator's amendment is that it seems to me, instead of making the salary of the judges of the Court of Customs Appeals to correspond with the salary of the judges of the Court of Claims, they should be made to harmonize with the salaries of the circuit judges as proposed in the amendment which we have just adopted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I desire to say that I intend to offer an amendment to the bill, now that the other salaries have been increased, to put the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims on the same basis as the salaries of judges of the circuit courts. That is where they belong, and I intend to offer that amendment; but it properly comes in prior to this point in the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad the Senator is going to do that. I think the judges of the Court of Claims ought to be paid that salary.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think it is clear that the salary of the judges of the Court of Customs Appeals should be the same as the salary of the judges of the Court of Claims, and if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should be voted on and adopted, then it would be in order to increase, if the Senate sees fit to do so, the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims. So, I think the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should be voted on first.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no conflict; I merely wanted to suggest that I was going to offer such an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad the Senator is going to do so, for I think it ought to be done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Alabama bases his contention upon the fact that the other salaries have been raised. I do not understand that they have been. I understand that the committee has reported in favor of raising them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My phraseology was misleading. They have been raised as far as the text of the bill stands now, and that is as far as I desired to go in my statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was afraid that expression might create a wrong impression upon the minds of the Members of the Senate. Of course, if these other salaries had been raised, then this salary perhaps ought to be raised; but they have not been raised, and I hope they will not be raised, and therefore the argument falls to the ground. It is like the little child that went out and thought it saw a dead chicken on the sidewalk, and said: "If it had been dead, mamma, I wonder who killed it?"

Mr. President, I do not see why everybody in the United States ought to be appealing to the Congress of the United States to-day for higher salaries and higher pay, at a time when every particle of patriotism there is in a human being ought to appeal to us to be satisfied with what we have, and not to seek anything more.

Of course, I understand the argument about a higher cost of living, and all that; but we have all had to meet that. People who did not have but $600 a year had to meet that. People who did not have but $1,000 a year had to meet the higher cost of living. All of us have had to do that. Why should these judges be promoted to $8,000, $9,000, $10,000 a year? What sacrosanct principle is it that makes them entitled to it?

I hope the Senate will not be mislead by the argument that other salaries are going to be advanced into voting to advance certain salaries, because if the Senate acts upon that idea, then we will have a sort of a confederacy of interest. Every friend of every judge who wants his salary increased will be voting for it upon the theory that some other judge's salary is to be increased, and when you get through you have got a sort of a trust, a sort of a legislative-enactment trust, to bundle them all together, and then bundle them all up at the higher rates. It does seem to me that this is a time when the ordinary patriotic American citizen ought not to be asking for higher pay, but ought to be volunteering to serve for less pay, if necessary, or at least expressing his willingness to serve for the same pay.

I hope this amendment will not be adopted, because if it is it just adds five or six or seven Senators who are interested by friendship to the list of those who will be interested by other friendships in increasing salaries all along the line.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if I am correctly informed, the bill at present stands amended so as to provide a salary of $9,000 for the district judges and $10,000 for the circuit judges.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in my observation I have found that the Federal judgeship is almost always the coveted goal of the average lawyer, and of good lawyers, at the salaries that have been paid heretofore. In considering the question of increasing the salaries of the employees here in the District of Columbia, those carrying on the governmental work of the various departments, this body, as well as the one at the other end of the Capitol, has gone on record as being opposed to increasing salaries in excess of 10 per cent, and that has been limited to a maximum salary of $2,500. We think that when we come to deal with the average young man or young woman working for the Government here for the mere pittance of $1,000 or $1,200 a year—many of them merely eking out an existence, you may say—we must be so economical, we must so safeguard the interests of the taxpayers of this country, that we tell them that they must not receive an increase of more than 10 per cent; and if they are enjoying a remuneration in excess of $2,500 a year, then they can not participate in an increase at all.

I have a great deal of respect for the judiciary of this country. I appreciate and esteem the legal profession. I am not one of those that are given to criticizing the judiciary, or that would detract from the men who compose the legal profession. We have no more patriotic, no more intelligent, no more loyal class of citizens than the members of the bar of our country. But, Mr. President, I say that in dealing with them we should deal with them just as we do with every other Government employee. We should deal with them with that same fair hand of justice tempered neither by favoritism nor by prejudice, that we deal with others who are serving our Government, others who are being paid by the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. President, my sympathy and my feelings of interest may be aroused; I may become concerned and sympathize with the average employee who is making only $1,200 or $1,500 a year. When you talk about increasing and raising his salary, I realize at once that there is merit in the contention. When you talk about such a young man or young woman not having sufficient upon which to live, and not having sufficient to even furnish himself or herself with the necessities of life, I can understand that; but when you go to talking about officers receiving $6,000 and $7,500 per annum and allowed their expenses when they are traveling in different parts of their district and allowed their per diem for their hotel bills, with working quarters furnished free, being pauperized and objects of pity I can not quite appreciate the appeal for pity.

I have seen this question agitated before about raising the salaries of the judiciary. I have heard it proclaimed that by doing so you will increase efficiency upon the bench. I have seen the salaries increased, and I have seen the same judge who was sitting upon that same bench at the old salary occupying it again at the increased salary; and that is going to be true throughout this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or an inferior judge succeeding him.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Very, very aptly put, Mr. President. I have sometimes seen an inferior judge succeeding him at the increased salary.

I do not think this is a very appropriate time to talk about increasing the salaries of those who are already getting sufficient remuneration to call to these positions of trust and honor and responsibility among the very best legal minds and talents of our country. Taking the bench of this country as a whole, it is composed of intelligent, patriotic, and efficient officials. It is only now and then we find a misfit. If increasing their salary is to be a benefit going directly to those occupying the bench at the time, there is no use of trimming our sails in order to make it appear that it is for the purpose of building up the efficiency or the dignity of the courts. It is not that. It is purely a matter of increasing the salaries of those who to-day are occupying these positions.

This body has passed a bill authorizing an additional judge in my State. You would not think there was any scarcity of splendid material to fill that office if you knew as much of the situation, and of the aspirants to it, as my colleague and myself know. There are a number of the best lawyers in the State who are anxious and willing to have the honor thrust upon them; and that is true throughout the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, by the way, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question. Is it not a part of his experience that lawyers will frequently give up incomes, say, of $10,000 to take a position for life upon the Federal bench at $6,000, and are glad to do it, because $6,000 a year as a certainty and for life is so much better than a problematical $10,000?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the statement of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi is very correct. As I stated at the outset of my argument, my observation has been that a judgeship upon the Federal bench is the coveted goal of the average lawyer of the country; and it is not confined to two-by-four lawyers, but applies to our most distinguished and capable lawyers.

What is $6,000 or $7,000 a year in the way of salary? That comes absolutely without any expenditure upon the part of the judge who enjoys it. You take an attorney making $10,000 or $12,000 per annum, with his office force to maintain, with his traveling expenses and his hotel bills, and he is not making any more net income than the lawyer who occupies the bench and receives his $6,000 or $7,000 a year without any expenses to pay. Do you think that the taxpayers of this country feel at this particular time, when they are already so heavily burdened, that you should increase the salaries of these judges so as to give them an income in excess of that of the lawyers making $10,000 or $12,000 a year in private practice? That is, it is equivalent to that as far as the net income is concerned. There is a wonderful difference between the gross amount of a lawyer's income and the net salary paid by the Government.

This bill now provides for $9,000 and $10,000 a year salary for district and circuit judges, respectively. I do not believe we should increase the salary to any such amount unless we are going to extend to every branch of this Government such magnanimity, such consideration for Government employees in other branches of the service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida one more question. Now that the people of the United States will probably have to help feed Belgium and Serbia and Roumania and northern France and Mesopotamia and Syria and Palestine, and later on perhaps even our enemies, Germany and Austria and Hungary, is this a time for men who love their country to be consenting, even, to receive increased salaries, when they already are getting enough to live on and to live comfortably?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I think the suggestions made by the Senator from Mississippi are very appropriate, and I feel myself that in the case of those who are receiving ample salaries at the present time it does not come with very good grace to seek an increase with the burdens upon our Republic at this time.

Take the judiciary of the States, Mr. President. A very large majority of the States only pay their circuit court judges salaries of $4,000 or $5,000 per annum. In my own State they receive a salary of $4,300 per annum, and are required to defray their own traveling expenses. You go to the supreme court—and I refer with pride to the Supreme Court of Florida, because we have none throughout this country that surpasses it or is its peer as a court composed of able, efficient, and well-trained lawyers—yet members of our supreme court receive the very small salary of $4,500 a year. I say "small." The members of the bar of that State do not seem to think so, if the question of the salary is the only thing that induces them to go upon the bench, because as each election rolls around you find various lawyers who are on the outside looking in, seeking to have the people of that State place them upon the supreme court bench at $4,500 a year. You go into the executive branch of the governments of the various States; I very hurriedly glanced over the list of the salaries paid by the different States, and I find that there are only about eight governors throughout the Union who receive compensations in excess of $7,000. Large States like New York, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and a few others pay salaries in excess of $7,000 per annum, but a very large majority of the States fix salaries ranging from $4,000 to $6,000 and $7,000 per annum. I should say that the average would possibly be around five or six thousand dollars per annum.

Of course, I know it will be contended here that these judges do not save anything out of their salaries, and that may be true with some of them; but when you consider that the judge of a Federal court has his appointment handed to him upon a silver platter, as far as any expense connected with his procuring it is concerned, and when you consider that when he has served a certain length of time and reached a certain age he is retired to private life with his full salary, I think they are being pretty well paid at the present time. They at least have a good living and an assurance of comfort in old age.

We had up here before us on one occasion the matter of increasing from $10,000 to $12,000 the salary of certain officials connected with the Federal Government. I said at that time that I was not willing to lend my voice nor was I willing to join in the advocacy of increasing the larger salaries until we did justice by those who were drawing the smaller salaries. It is a rather peculiar thing. Very often you find a man who thinks that the official who is already well paid should have his salary increased; but when the day comes to deal with a raise for those receiving a smaller salary, some of those who championed raising the high salary turn topsy-turvy, take a slide upon the toboggan, do the acrobatic stunt, and you find them opposing raising the salary of the man who is getting twelve or fifteen or eighteen hundred dollars per year, because, as they claim, he is getting along very nicely and getting all he is worth.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] very wisely suggests that "to him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator can not give the Senator from Mississippi credit for that. It is from St. Mark.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I give the Senator from Mississippi credit for his quotation. Whether or not he is exactly correct in the quotation does not make any particular difference. It fits very nicely indeed, and is a good guess. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am opposed to the bill in its present form, and hope that it will not be passed as amended, giving, as I stated before, at present, in the form in which it is amended, a salary of $9,000 to the district judges and $10,000 to the circuit judges. My opposition to this is not based upon any feeling other than that of the highest respect and consideration for the judiciary of the country. I realize that the judiciary is one of the great bulwarks of this country for our protection and defense, for the security of a civilized people, and that the judges should enjoy a reasonable salary; but I believe, when everything is considered and the present conditions of our country are taken into account, that it would not be right, it would not be justice to the taxpayers of this country, to increase the salaries up to nine and ten thousand dollars, as provided in this measure.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I simply desire to call attention to the fact that the amendment which I have offered has nothing to do with rates. It simply puts one court, which I think should not have been omitted, on the same basis as the other court, whatever that basis may be.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section in the bill, on page 6, after line 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the presiding judge and the associate judges, respectively, of the United States Court of Customs Appeals shall receive salaries equal in amount to the salaries provided by this act to be paid the chief justice and other judges, respectively, of the Court of Claims, payable monthly from the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there could be only one objection to this amendment. It would be that possibly the salary of this court ought to be fixed in a revenue bill, rather than in this judicial bill; but it was not considered in the revenue bill, and I shall not object to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, along the same line as the amendment just offered, to equalize the salaries upon the same basis that they were before the bill was amended, I move to strike out, on page 5, line 25, after the word "office," the words "The chief justice shall be entitled to receive," down to the end of that section, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The chief justice and the other judges of the Court of Claims shall receive salaries upon the same basis as salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a new section, after line 14, on page 5, as follows:

SEC. —. The salary of the chief justice of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Hawaii shall be $7,000 per annum, and that of the associate justices thereof shall be $6,500 per annum, and the salary of the several circuit judges of the Territory of Hawaii shall be $5,000 per annum.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there are two sets of judges in the Territory of Hawaii. One set presides over matters of Federal jurisdiction, and the other set presides over matters of Territorial jurisdiction, to administer the laws enacted by the Territorial Legislature of Hawaii. All are paid by the United States. This amendment is to increase somewhat the salaries of the Territorial judges.

The judges of the Territorial courts of the Philippines receive the following salaries: The chief justice receives $8,000 per annum, and there are six associate judges receiving $7,500 each per annum. I have offered this amendment to increase the salaries of the Territorial judges of Hawaii to some extent, but not nearly so much as the salaries received by the judges of the Philippines.

I have here a memorial from the Bar Association of Hawaii, praying for an increase in salary for their Territorial judges, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. My amendment does not increase the salaries of the Territorial judges in Hawaii as much as this memorial prays for. I did not see fit to ask so much as that, but it increases them somewhat.

I now ask to have the memorial read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, would not the Senator be satisfied to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. MYERS. No; I would not, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we can not afford to go beyond the district judges. I am utterly opposed to this amendment, unless you want to kill the bill. If you expect to have any of these salaries increased you must be reasonable about it, or tolerably reasonable.

I think it was a mistake to put the circuit and district judges up to $9,000 or $10,000. I would be perfectly willing to have their salaries increased to that extent if I were the sole person to vote upon it, but I do not believe it is possible to pass those increases through the House.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the memorial be read and then that the amendment be voted on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the Bar Association of the Hawaiian Islands respectfully presents this petition to the Congress of the United States, and your petitioners say as follows:

1. That Congress, by the act of Congress of May 27, 1910, section 8, Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 443, fixed the annual salaries of the judges of the several courts of record of this Territory as follows: The chief justice of the supreme court at $6,000, the first and second associate justices of said court at $5,500 each, and the judges of the several circuit courts at $4,000 each.

2. That the Bar Association of the Hawaiian Islands, at its regular quarterly meeting held in Honolulu on the 27th day of February, A. D. 1918, unanimously adopted a resolution to petition the Congress of the United States to increase the salaries by an act of Congress, as follows: That the annual salary of the chief justice of the supreme court be increased to $8,000, the associate justices to $7,500, and the several circuit judges to $6,000; and this resolution was adopted after a thorough investigation.

3. That since the passage of the act of May 27, 1910, section 8, Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 443, by the Congress of the United States, the cost of living in Hawaii has steadily advanced each year, and more particularly since the beginning of the present European war, and the salaries, as fixed by the said act, are wholly inadequate for the support of the several judges of the said courts in this Territory.

4. The dignity and requirements of the judges of our courts of record are such as to require them and each of them to expend their entire salaries, and most of them have been compelled to depend upon their private income to meet the expenses of living during their term of office. Since the declaration of war by the United States there has been a continuous increase in the cost of every article of use and consumption in Hawaii. Rents, boarding rates, clothing, food supplies, wages of servants, and every possible article which they are called upon to purchase have positively advanced in price, and the purchasing power, therefore, of these salaries has diminished to such an extent as to make it impossible for the judges to meet their current expenses and to maintain the dignity which their social position requires. In this connection it should not be overlooked that nearly everything they use, from the material with which their homes are built to the articles of food upon their tables (barring a partial and inadequate local supply of meat, fish, and vegetables), has to be transported hither from the mainland or from New Zealand and Australia, and, in addition to the largely increased cost of these materials at the points of their production, the cost of their transportation hither has been many times multiplied as a result of the scarcity of shipping.

5. The present occupants of the several judicial positions command the respect and confidence of the bar of these islands, and of the commercial interests, and the people at large realize that the impartial administration of justice is paramount to all other considerations, and that the judges should receive such salaries so as to enable them to be independent; and it is also well known that many of the appointees, upon accepting the positions, made large sacrifices by giving up their lucrative law practice in response to a demand and request from the bar that they accept these positions.

6. The litigation in the Hawaiian Islands is of a varied and of a mixed character, and the several dockets of the several courts demonstrate that the judges are required to perform very laborious tasks and give their entire time to the several duties of their office; and most of the calendars in the several circuits can not be kept clear, because jury trials, as a rule, can not be shortened; and yet the judges have been ever zealous, and especially the present appointees, in trying to clear the docket.

7. The Bar Association of Hawaii can not too strongly present the facts in support of an increase in the salaries of the judges, and we are conversant with and know well that, in view of economic conditions here and for the reasons set out in this memorial, the salaries are wholly inadequate, and we therefore humbly pray for favorable action in the premises.

Attached to the memorial of this association is the form of a bill amending the act of May 27, 1910, section 8, Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 443, and we pray that it may be introduced in the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

THE BAR ASSOCIATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Dated at Honolulu this 15th day of March, A. D. 1918.

A bill to amend section 92 of the act approved April 30, 1900, entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," as amended by section 8 of chapter 258, Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, approved May 27, 1910.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

SECTION 1. That section 92 of the act approved April 30, 1900, entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," being chapter 339, Thirty-first Statutes at Large, as said section is amended in and by an act approved May 27, 1910, being section 8 of chapter 258, Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, is hereby further amended so as to read as follows:

That the following officers shall receive the following annual salaries, to be paid by the United States: The governor, $7,000; the secretary of the Territory, $4,000; the chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory, $8,000; the associate justices of the supreme court, $7,500 each; the judges of the circuit courts, $6,000 each; the United States district attorney, $4,000; the United States marshal, $3,000. And the governor shall receive annually, in addition to his salary, the sum of $500 for stationery, postage, and incidentals; also his traveling expenses while absent from the capital on official business; and the sum of $2,000 annually for his private secretary."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its approval.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to warn Senators unless they wish to defeat the bill we must not add more matter of that kind. I hope the amendment will be rejected. It applies to an entirely different class of judicial officers. I wish to urge that we defeat this proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ASHURST. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section as follows:

SEC. —. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Florida, who shall reside in said district, and whose compensation, duties, and powers shall be the same as now provided by law for the judge of said district.

That the President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional judge for the northern district of California, who shall reside in said district and shall possess the same qualifications and have the same powers and jurisdiction and receive the same salary now prescribed by law in respect of the present district judges therein.

That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint two additional district judges for the northern judicial district of the State of Illinois, each of whom shall possess the same qualifications and have the same powers and jurisdiction as now prescribed by law in respect to the present judges for that district.

That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the western judicial district of the State of North Carolina senior in commission such vacancy shall not be filled, and thereafter there shall be but one district judge in said district.

That hereafter there shall be a district judge of the United States for the middle district of the State of Tennessee, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall possess the same qualifications and shall have the same powers and jurisdiction and receive the same compensation prescribed by law in respect to district judges of the United States: Provided, That the judge now acting for the eastern and middle districts of Tennessee shall continue to act in both said districts until a judge is appointed and qualified for the middle district as hereinafter provided.

That the district judge now holding office and acting for both said districts and his successors shall be assigned to and hereafter be the district judge for the eastern district in said State.

That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint the district judge for the middle district in said State, who shall, as to all business and proceedings arising in said middle judicial district, possess and exercise all the powers conferred by existing law upon judges of the district courts of the United States, and who shall succeed to and possess the same powers and perform the same duties within the said middle judicial district as are now possessed and performed by the district judge acting for both said districts in said State.

That terms of court may be held at the places and in the manner now prescribed by law in the eastern judicial district by the judge of the middle district or in the middle judicial district by the judge of the eastern district, provided it is mutually agreed by and between the judges of each of said districts that the public interest demands it.

That terms of court may be held at the places and in the manner now prescribed by law in the southern judicial district by the judge of the northern district or in the northern judicial district by the judge of the southern district, provided it is mutually agreed by and between the judges of each of said districts that the public interest demands it.

That all laws and parts of laws so far as inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Arizona if he is not willing to allow the amendment to be printed and go over.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course; but if we want to finish the bill to-night——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think we can.

Mr. ASHURST. Now, let me say that the frowns of my friend will avail nothing. I have a right as a United States Senator to offer any amendment that I see fit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I did not mean to question that.

Mr. ASHURST. I stand by my right to offer this amendment. It simply gives additional judges to those States that need them. The judges for the States of North Carolina, Tennessee, Illinois, California, Mississippi, Montana, and Arizona are very much overworked. In those States additional judges are needed. This amendment simply includes those bills that have passed this Senate during the Sixty-fifth Congress granting additional judges. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate considered the situation in these various States. It ascertained that the judge in Florida, in the southern district, was the most overworked judge in the United States. It ascertained that the district judge in Arizona was the next most overworked judge in the United States, and the next were the judges in Montana, Illinois, Tennessee, North Carolina, Mississippi, and California.

This amendment simply includes those bills which the Senate has already passed. The part of the amendment which relates to a new judge for the southern district of Florida passed the Senate February 6, 1918. The part of the amendment providing for a new judge in the northern district of California passed the Senate May 21, 1918. The bill providing for two new judges in the northern district of the State of Illinois passed the Senate May 21, 1918. The bill providing for an additional judge in the district of Arizona passed the Senate February 5, 1918. That part of the amendment providing for an additional judge for the district of Montana passed the Senate September 11, 1917.

That part of the amendment which provides for an additional judge in North Carolina passed the Senate May 16, 1918. That part of the amendment providing for a new judge in the State of Tennessee passed the Senate September 12, 1917, and that part of the amendment which provides for an additional judge in the State of Mississippi passed the Senate September 11, 1918.

I submit that the Senate seriously passed those bills, and I resent any suggestion of impatience or any suggestion that I ought not to be heard at this time.

The imperial State of California needs this additional judge, and Montana, Illinois, Arizona, Mississippi, North Carolina, and Tennessee need additional judges. I serve notice that I am not a State senator but a United States Senator, and if Georgia needs an additional judge, if in good faith Indiana needs a judge, why should we decline to grant it?

The Senate of the United States passed these bills which make up my amendment. Senators say, "Why do you not include my State in your amendment?" I did not do that because the Judiciary Committee of the Senate had not considered such bills. The amendment I have just presented is made up of those bills that have passed the Senate; in other words, it includes simply, solely, and only the bills that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate reported favorably after hearings that were voluminous, and which bills have passed the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator will pardon me. Senators must not grow impatient when a new and young Senator insists on having a right to be heard. I am in favor of this bill, even should my amendment fail. I have been a constant and, I believe, a just critic of some of our Federal judges, but I am glad to see the salaries of the Federal judges increased. In this day of Bolshevism, in this day when the I. W. W. is clamoring at your gate seeking to tear down your civilization, it will be the judges who are not afraid to enforce the law that will save our civilization of to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator in charge of the bill feels that my amendment, which includes only those bills that have passed the Senate, would imperil this bill, I will withdraw it. Does the Senator fear that my amendment would do that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not prepared to say further than this: The subject was considered by the Judiciary Committee, and we determined that it would not do to undertake to attach these several bills to the pending bill lest it might jeopardize it. The Senator from Florida was present and suggested that the bill applicable to Florida be added, but it was finally agreed by the committee that in the opinion of the committee it was best not to undertake to attach any general legislation to the pending bill.

While I am on my feet I want to say to the Senator that when I found there were so many of them included in his amendment I thought it was a piece of humor.

Mr. ASHURST. A piece of humor! The Senator is a Member of the Judiciary Committee, which reported these bills which make up my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator has given me the floor by asking me a question, and I am going to ask him to let me finish my answer.

Mr. ASHURST. I am at times a little humorous, and sometimes the Senator may intend to be, but I do not get off any humor in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not suppose when there were so many of them that they were to be pressed at this time, and that is why I manifested some impatience. Of course, I recognize the right of the Senator to press them and press them just as long as he desires. I have no doubt I voted for every one of them, and if they can go through I do not object to their going through.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is on the Judiciary Committee and gave the committee the benefit of his vast experience as a lawyer and a statesman. He voted for each and every one of these bills, except one of them, which was ordered reported when he was not present. I now yield for a moment to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to say this, Mr. President: I fully agree with the Senator from Arizona that it is better to increase the number of judges to take care of the business of the country than it is to increase the salaries of the judges who are already willingly serving at the present salary and whose places are being awaited by countless numbers of briefless attorneys or attorneys with briefs. I think, if we are going to pass this bill, it might be very well to put upon it additional judgeships. I think it would be infinitely better than increasing the salaries of the judges who are already willingly serving at their present salaries. Not one of them would resign if you gave him a $10,000 check to-morrow. But I was going to suggest that it is growing late, and, as the Senator in charge of the bill has some very important amendments pending that I would not be willing to have considered without a quorum, I was going to ask that we take a recess.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Arizona has finished, I move that the Senate take a recess——

Mr. ASHURST. I do not want to delay the progress of the bill. I think the bill should pass, but I believe the Senate should seriously consider my amendment. I want to give additional judges to those States that require them, and let me remind you that I think the Judiciary Committee of the Senate of the United States—I happen to be on it—is "some" body of men. There are CHARLES A. CULBERSON and ALBERT B. CUMMINS—I can name more who are able lawyers on the Judiciary Committee—HOKE SMITH, KNUTE NELSON, L. S. OVERMAN, and FRANK B. BRANDEGEE, and all the balance of them. The Judiciary Committee found, after hearings, that the State of California in good faith ought to have an additional judge; that in the State of Illinois the Federal courts are cluttered with business; that the same is true of Florida by reason of its proximity to Cuba; that the same is true of Arizona, with 300 miles of international border and hundreds upon hundreds of smuggling cases and the judge working harder than I ever want to work. The Arizona judge has had but four weeks' vacation in four years.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr ASHURST. I yield; but first let me say that the Senate of the United States has passed every one of these bills and the Judiciary Committee was unanimous in its report on each one of the bills——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One of the bills passed the Senate three times.

Mr. ASHURST. I did not know that. That was the Mississippi case. I knew it had passed once.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a concurrent resolution here which, of course, would not settle this judicial question; but I think it would help to still the storm of Bolshevism, and I ask unanimous consent out of order to have it read. It is a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. Not in my time, of course, and not in the middle of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Arizona to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it will suit the Senator from North Dakota to have it read to-morrow morning, I am quite anxious to move for a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GRONNA. It is very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield for the purpose of having it read?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield for no purpose whatever now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona declines to yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield the floor in a moment to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. All right.

Mr. ASHURST. If I had not been interrupted I would have finished a long time ago. I fear that owing to the cluttered condition of legislation the various bills regarding these judges will not pass the other branch of Congress, and surely I do not need to remind the Senate that a bill must pass another branch of Congress before it becomes a law. I have been, I repeat, a constant and severe, and yet I think truthful, critic of some of our Federal judges, and if time permitted I could point to instances where grave abuses have been perpetrated by some of the Federal judges, where injunctions against laboring men, especially, have been unjustly issued, improvidently issued; but that does not alter the fact that the Federal judges, as a rule, are clean, able, and courageous.

While now and then some judge falters in his duty, the record made in the recent war with Germany by our Federal judiciary is a record replete with courageous patriotism. Witness the splendid services of Judge Landis, of Illinois, and the decision of Judge Speer, of Georgia, on the question of the selective draft. His opinion has become a classic in our jurisprudence. I could name others, but time does not permit.

I made an argument before the Committee on the Judiciary with reference to the necessity for an additional judge in the State of Arizona, and very copious data were gathered by me relative to that matter. I should like to have permission to include it in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE IN ARIZONA.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., Monday, December 10, 1917.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST, a Senator of the United States from the State of Arizona, to-day submitted the following memornda and letters to the subcommittee—Messrs. FLETCHER (chairman), SHIELDS, and BRANDEGEE—appointed to consider his bill (S. 714) providing for an additional judge for the district of Arizona:

The text of the bill is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional judge for the district of Arizona, who shall reside in said district and shall possess the same qualifications and have the same powers and jurisdiction and receive the same salary now prescribed by law in respect of the present district judge therein.

"SEC. 2. That in case of disagreement in relation thereto between the judges of said district court the senior circuit judge of the ninth circuit shall make all rules for the transaction of the business of said court and all necessary orders for the division of the work and the assignment of cases for trial.

"SEC. 3. That the clerk of the district court for the district of Arizona and the marshal and district attorney for said district shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices, respectively, for said court."

The bill provides for the appointment of an additional judge for the district of Arizona. The United States district courts for the district of Arizona are overcrowded. It is utterly impossible for one judge properly to handle the business of the district. Notwithstanding the fact that the present judge has held regular sessions and rarely observed holidays, Sundays excepted, he has been unable to keep up with the constantly increasing calendars. The present judge has taken but two weeks' vacation in the past three and one-third years. Some of the facts showing the reason for the present overcrowded condition of the dockets are set forth as follows:

The estimated population for draft apportionment of Arizona is 409,203. (S. Doc. 64, 65th Cong., 1st sess., p. 9.) The area of the State is 113,956 square miles. The Indian population of Arizona (exclusively under the jurisdiction of the United States) is 44,436. (Report Committee on Indian Affairs, 1916, p. 73.)

A factor contributing to the increase of the business of the Federal court in Arizona is the large area of the State which is included within Indian, forest, and military reservations, and therefore subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of said court. The area which is involved in Indian, forest, and military reservations in Arizona equals 42 per cent of the total area of the State. This is a larger proportion exclusively within Federal control than any other State in the Union.

In order to exhibit a comparative analysis of the business transacted by the courts of the United States in Arizona and that disposed of in other States, statements have been compiled by the Department of Justice covering the northern and southern districts of Florida, Louisiana (eastern and western district), Mississippi (northern and southern districts), the States of Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, Utah, Wyoming, and Arizona. The comparisons are valuable as furnishing a reason for the passage of the bill:

Alabama has a Federal judge for every 767,092 of population and 17,332 square miles of area.

Maine has a Federal judge for its 767,038 of population and 33,040 square miles of area.

California has a Federal judge for every 712,068 of population and 39,577 square miles of area.

Texas has a Federal judge for every 868,742 of population and 53,179 square miles of area.

Arizona has one Federal judge for its 409,203 of population and 113,956 square miles of area.

EXPENSES.

The costs of conducting said courts for the years mentioned were as follows:

District.	1913	1914	1915	1916
Arizona	$48,429.71	$56,321.02	$56,600.02	$57,526.66

In explanation of the higher expense involved in the administration of the Federal courts in Arizona, as compared with other States, the provision for and the care of prisoners involves more expenditure for the upkeep and maintenance of prisoners, involves greater outlay for mileage of jurors, witnesses, and officers, because the distances are greater and the travel is more expensive. The main lines of railroad charge 3 cents and branch lines not less than 4 cents per mile. The transport of prisoners convicted of felony to Atlanta and Leavenworth Penitentiaries covers a distance of thousands of miles, in some cases reaching several hundred dollars per prisoner. Many Chinese deportation cases are also tried, as the border protected by this jurisdiction is seveal hundred miles. The actual distance covered by the southern boundary line of Arizona bordering upon Mexico, from Ogdens Landing, in the southwestern corner of the State, to the Guadalupe Mountains, in the southeastern corner, is approximately 400 miles, a longer distance than is covered by any other division of the United States courts, whether in Texas or New Mexico, bordering upon the Republic of Mexico. The character of the country giving views of the border monuments marking the international boundary and characteristic scenes along that border are shown in Senate Document No. 247, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, which covers the report of the International Boundary Commission fixing the boundary between the United States and the Republic of Mexico west of the Rio Grande River.

COMPARATIVE AREAS.

The area of the State of Arizona, comprising the district of Arizona, is equal to the approximate areas of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, and New York. Its area is greater than all of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware; or Illinois, Indiana, New Hampshire, and New Jersey combined. The figures which bear out this statement are shown in the following tables:

		Area in square miles.
Arizona		113,956

CLASSIFICATION OF BUSINESS TRANSACTED.

A complete synopsis of all cases which were commenced, terminated, and pending, whether civil, criminal, or equity, is shown in the next table following. This includes cases both civil and criminal to which the Government is not a party, and is for the four years from 1913 to 1916, both included. The percentages of each class of cases instituted of the total are shown in the last three columns. The statement is as follows:

District.	United States civil.	United States criminal.	Cases to which United States is not a party.	Per cent of total.
				United States civil.	United States criminal.	Other.
Arizona	73	997	227	0.057	0.763	0.18
Florida:
Northern	45	437	269	.06	.58	.36
Southern	567	439	891	.298	.23	.472
Louisiana:

Utah	67	142	221	.156	.33	.514
Wyoming	66	170	152	.17	.43	.40

The above statement shows that Arizona Federal courts disposed of more criminal cases than any other division of the United States courts shown in the above table, and that a larger percentage of the cases were criminal prosecutions than in any other division of the courts enumerated, excepting the Federal courts for the State of Nevada, viz, Nevada, 77 per cent, and Arizona, 76.3 per cent. The major portion of the business transacted on the criminal dockets is for violation of the laws of the Government against contraband smuggling, in the protection of a border 400 miles in extent marked by few natural and no artificial barriers; and also cases involving the introduction of whisky into the Indian, military, or other Government reservations. The largest proportion of cases involving the introduction of whisky into the State and the reservations lies against nonresidents of the State who seek to introduce the liquor for the great profit involved, the State of Arizona now being prohibition territory, "bone dry." The smuggling of arms out of and the introduction of contraband into the jurisdiction give rise to many cases on the criminal docket, and these are against nonresidents almost exclusively.

In obedience to statute, court is held twice a year in four places, namely, Prescott, Phoenix, Tucson, and Globe. The distance by rail from Prescott to Globe is 497 miles. It will thus be observed that the distance between Prescott and Globe is about the distance from Washington to Cincinnati or from Washington to Portland, Me. Litigants and witnesses are frequently required to traverse the entire distance (497 miles) to reach the place where court is held, and court is held as directed by statute. In some instances a term is suspended at one place while the judge travels to another place upon its business, after dispatching which he returns to the former place, completes the business there, and then returns to the latter place and dispatches the business there. In this connection it should be remembered that a grand jury must be assembled in each place twice a year. Thus it will be observed that the present judge convenes eight grand juries each year.

An inquiry was made by the Department of Justice, addressed to the United States judge and the United States attorney for the district of Arizona, as to the advisability of the proposed legislation. The recommendations of the judge and the United States attorney were strongly in favor of the enactment of this measure into law. Copies of their letters are hereto attached.

One-third of the copper produced in the United States is mined and smelted in the State of Arizona; its Indian population is greater than that of any other State excepting Oklahoma; and the area which is included within forest, Indian, and other reservations exclusively under the jurisdiction of the United States courts is larger than in any other State.

The necessity for the speedy passage of the bill (S. 714) is manifest.

The following letters and statistics, from the Department of Justice, are submitted to the committee:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 17, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Permit me to acknowledge receipt of your request of the 10th instant for information tending to show the desirability, or otherwise, of the legislation proposed in the bill (S. 714) providing for an additional judge for the district of Arizona.

In order to expedite this matter as much as possible I am inclosing herewith copies of letters received from the judge and district attorney for the district of Arizona, dated December 29, 1916, and January 12, 1917, respectively, expressing their views in connection with S. 7484, which provided for the division of the State of Arizona into two judicial districts. The information contained in these letters will indicate to your committee the business that is being transacted in the present district.

There are also inclosed herewith for further information copies of comparative statements made from the records of this department showing in detail the number of cases commenced and terminated in the district of Arizona during the last four years, the number of cases pending at the close of each fiscal year, and the relative increase or decrease in the number of cases terminated and commenced. In addition, the statements show the expense of conducting the court during said periods.

It is hoped that the information submitted will meet the requirements of your inquiry.

Very respectfully,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
DISTRICT OF ARIZONA,
Globe, Ariz., January 12, 1917.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I received your wire of December 29, 1916, directing me to furnish my opinion as to the desirableness, or otherwise, of proposed legislation to divide Arizona into two judicial districts, reply to which has been delayed by preparation for the present term now convening here.

The proposed legislation is, in my judgment, most desirable from many viewpoints. An examination of our monthly and term reports will readily disclose the amount of criminal business transacted by this court, but the full value of the work entailed can not be gathered from a mere inspection of these reports. Add to the criminal business the civil cases in which the United States is a party and the calendar of private civil litigation and it can be seen without serious question that the burden which Judge Sawtelle has to carry is inordinately heavy. That he has been able to dispatch the work, as indicated by the cases closed, can be accounted for only by a just tribute to his excessive application, entailing few days of rest and recreation, with the consequent inroad on his mental and physical vitality.

Withal he has not been able to give to many important matters the attention needed to dispose of them promptly and to the satisfaction of litigants. We have had several very important suits by the Government submitted during the past year and have only recently been able to obtain decrees in them. They involved intricate legal questions, to which the court, on account of the many terms intervening, could not with promptness address itself. That sufficient time was not available for consideration of cases submitted, as indicated by the fact that notwithstanding only eight terms a year are provided for in this district, the other months being, no doubt, intended for preparation and deliberation, we have had sessions of court in every one of the months of the past year—here at Globe in January, in February at Tucson, regular terms at Prescott, Phoenix, and Tucson in March, April, and May, respectively; the May term at Tucson was continued far into the month of June, necessitating the postponement of the regular June term here at Globe.

In July and August an adjourned term was held at Prescott to try equity cases, and September, October, November, and December were occupied with the regular terms at Prescott, Phoenix, and Tucson, the term at Tucson occupying nearly all of December and again necessitating the postponement of the regular term here until this month. An adjourned term is already called at Tucson for next month; the four regular terms will follow at the four places for holding court, with splendid chances for another summer session at Prescott to consider equity cases, which are invariably set at the foot of the calendar and the terms wholly occupied with jury cases.

On the question of the effect of the proposed legislation on the work of this office, it goes without argument that it would be appreciably lightened. I recognize the proneness of some officials to continually remind others of the awful pressure of official duties, and it is with some reluctance that I mention our own work. It is quite true, though, that since assuming office about three years ago I have been compelled, in order to give proper attention to the work, to practically abandon all private practice, and never during my term have I had the satisfaction of feeling that I could leave the work for more than an occasional off day. In the three years I have taken but one vacation, which was last summer, when I was granted 12 days' leave and spent just one week on the coast.

Night work is the invariable rule during court sessions, being absolutely indispensable if the work is to be kept up to date, and, as has been noted, the sessions are not often intermittent. What I say in this connection applies equally to the assistants of the office, whose official work leaves them little time for private practice, and who are most faithful, devoted, and interested in their labors.

The State of Arizona is rapidly growing in population and in business enterprises; litigation of every description is increasing and will continue to increase, and the jurisdiction of the Federal court is sought on every conceivable occasion. While it is true that the work of this office could be distributed by the addition of several assistants and more clerical help, which has become a necessity, this would not solve the burdens of the court in any respect. Primarily, therefore, for the amelioration of his increasing labors, do I recommend the division, and I feel also that, because of the great area of Arizona and the great distance to be covered in attending to the business of the court, the best solution would be the creation of another district. The work of each district would then be more centralized and accomplished with greater dispatch than now prevails. Most of the above reasons, together with others, are set forth in the resolution of the Arizona Bar Association, passed January 8, 1917, at Phoenix, Ariz., a copy of which I herewith inclose. I shall be pleased to furnish further specific data disclosed by our records if you desire, and shall be pleased to answer any specific questions which you may send to me.

Very sincerely, yours,

THOMAS A. FLYNN,
United States Attorney.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
DISTRICT OF ARIZONA,
JUDGE'S CHAMBERS,
Tucson, Ariz., December 29, 1916.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your telegram of this date, in which you state, "Bill has been introduced to divide Arizona into two judicial districts. Please furnish your opinion as to desirableness or otherwise proposed legislation in as much detail as convenience will permit, stating facts on which same is based," will say it is my opinion that such legislation is not only desirable but absolutely necessary. It is utterly impossible for one judge properly to handle the business of the district. Notwithstanding the fact that I have held long sessions and rarely observed holidays, Sundays excepted, I have been unable to keep up with the constantly increasing calendars. I have taken just two weeks' vacation during the past three and one-third years.

Practically all of my time is occupied in the trial of causes, and written opinions are prepared only in rare instances. When prepared, I am compelled to remain in my chambers until late in the night. The number of cases removed from the State courts is constantly increasing. On account of the great number of criminal and civil jury cases, equity and bankruptcy cases can not within a reasonable time be heard and determined.

I have not available data which would enable me to give you the number of cases filed at each of the four places of holding terms of court in the district during the year 1916. More cases are disposed of at Tucson than at any other one place in the district. An examination of the calendar for the May term, 1916, at Tucson shows that there were then pending 119 criminal cases, 54 equity and law cases, and 18 bankruptcy cases, 95 of which were disposed of at said term; the calendar for the November term, 1916, at Tucson shows 109 criminal cases, 73 equity and law cases, and 13 bankruptcy cases; to date 73 of said cases have been disposed of, and the November term, 1916, is still in session, the Globe term having been postponed.

There are located within the State of Arizona a number of Indian reservations, national forests and national monuments, and a large military reservation. All suits or proceedings affecting the same or any thereof, and all crimes committed upon or within the boundaries thereof, are, of course, triable only in the Federal court. Many of these cases involve new questions which can not or should not be hastily determined. There is a great number of criminal cases arising under the internal revenue, immigration, and neutrality laws, particularly along the international line. The mining and smelting companies, railroad companies, public-service corporations, and other foreign corporations invariably invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal court.

I herewith inclose for your inspection copies of calendars for the May and November terms, respectively. As above stated, Tucson is only one of four of the places where terms of court are held.

In this connection I might add that the act of Congress approved October 3, 1913, provides that terms of court shall be held at Prescott on the first Monday in March and September, at Phoenix on the first Monday in April and October, at Tucson on the first Monday in May and November, and at Globe on the first Monday in June and December. The distance by rail from Prescott to Phoenix is 137 miles; from Phoenix to Tucson, 122 miles; from Tucson to Globe, 238 miles; and from Globe to Prescott, 497 miles.

In conclusion I wish to state that in my judgment the Government would save money by dividing the district. The Government now provides suitable accommodations for holding court at Prescott and Globe and no additional outlay therefor would be required.

The United States marshal for this district informs me that between December 1, 1915, and December 1, 1916, he paid for the feeding and maintaining of Federal prisoners the sum of $13,701.82. If the district court could hold monthly adjournments of the regular terms for the trial of criminal and civil causes, approximately 50 per cent of said amount—and perhaps an equal amount now paid to witnesses who are compelled to remain in attendance upon the court for days at a time awaiting call—could be saved.

The division of the district would not only save the Government money but would enable the court to administer justice without unnecessary delay.

Respectfully,

WM. H. SAWTELLE, Judge.

District of Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than a very short time if it desires to vote on the question. If I thought the enactment of this measure would imperil the bill, it might be an argument in favor of my vote for the amendment. I merely want to say that in my judgment we have plenty of judges now and we need no more.

Mr. ASHURST. May I interrupt my friend?

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado declines to yield.

Mr. THOMAS. When we consider that in the island of Great Britain there are fewer judges to attend to the business of 45,000,000 people than there are in the single American State of Illinois, we at once perceive that the difficulty is not with the judges and with the number of courts, but with their manner of transacting business. If we could follow, as we ought to follow, the expeditious way in which legal business is transacted in the Kingdom of Great Britain we could afford to pay our judges a great deal more than we do, and we would transact more business, and the question of salary would not be so important. I yield now to the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are two amendments, verbal in their nature, which are still to be made. On page 7, line 17, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] calls my attention to the fact that the language as used in one place is not clear. Therefore, after the word "so," in line 17, I move to strike out the words "entitled to resign or retire" and to substitute "retiring voluntarily, or whose mental or physical condition caused the President to appoint an additional judge."

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the Secretary state the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 17, after the word "so," it is proposed to strike out the words "entitled to resign or retire" and insert "retiring voluntarily, or whose mental or physical condition caused the President to appoint an additional judge."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So that it will read:

And the judge so retiring voluntarily, or whose mental or physical condition caused the President to appoint an additional judge, shall be held and treated as junior in commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are two other verbal amendments reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 24, after the word "court," it is proposed to insert the words "to be appointed by such judges."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 8, line 5, after the word "as," to strike out "herein," and in the same line, after the word "provided," to insert "in this section," so as to read:

Upon the death, resignation, or retirement of any circuit or district judge, so entitled to resign, following the appointment of any additional judge as provided in this section, the vacancy caused by such death, resignation, or retirement of the said judge so entitled to resign shall not be filled.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, to change the number of section 5 to section 6.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the vote was so close on the amendment offered by me—being only 17 to 18—and so many Senators have importuned me to reserve the amendment, that I desire to give notice that I will ask for a separate vote on the amendment when the bill gets out of the Committee of the Whole into the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona reserves the right to a separate vote on his amendment when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, unless the Senator in charge of the bill does so, I wish to reserve for a separate vote in the Senate the amendment which proposes to advance the salaries of district judges to $9.000 and of circuit judges to $10,000. I think those figures are too high.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa gives notice that the question of raising the salaries of the district and circuit judges will be reserved by him to be voted upon separately in the Senate.

The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and is still open to amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill how long he expects to run this evening?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No longer, if Senators prefer to stop. If we wish a quorum to vote upon the amendments reserved it will be useless to go on to-night unless Senators are sent for. I move, Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST and Mr. GRONNA addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. ASHURST. At the request of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who has just been called from the Chamber, and on his behalf, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask that the resolution just submitted be read by title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 415), as follows:

Whereas a petition has been filed with the Senate of the United States by Mr. Henry Ford, of Michigan, contesting the election of Mr. Truman H. Newberry, of Michigan, as a Senator from the said State, and asking for the preservation and recount of the ballots, and the investigation of the unlawful expenditures of money alleged to have been made by and on behalf of the said Mr. Truman H. Newberry, and notice thereof has been given; and

Whereas information has been received to the effect that in certain localities within the State some of the ballots are being destroyed, and that others are likely to be destroyed unless they are taken possession of by the Senate for the purpose of preserving and recounting the same: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said petition, and the papers and the documents accompanying the same, be, and they are hereby, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation and report thereon; and be it

Resolved further, That the said Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, authorized and empowered to take possession of the ballots, poll books, tally sheets, and all other documents and records relating to the said election held for United States Senator in the State of Michigan on the 5th day of November, 1918, and that the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he is hereby, instructed to carry out the directions of the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, in that behalf, and that the said committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, directed to proceed with all convenient speed to take all necessary steps for the preservation of the said ballots, poll books, tally sheets, and other documents, and to recount the said ballots, and to take and preserve all evidence as to the various matters alleged in the said petition and notice, and of any alleged fraud, irregularity, and unlawful expenditure of money in the said election and primaries, and to the intimidation of voters, or other facts affecting the result of said election; and be it

Resolved further, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and during any recess of the Senate, or of the Congress, to hold its sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation; and to have full power to subpœna parties and witnesses, and to require the production of all papers, books, and documents, and other evidence relating to the said investigation; and to employ clerks and stenographers, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to take and make a record of all evidence taken and received by the committee; and to keep a record of its proceedings; and to have such evidence, records, and other matter required by the committee printed; and be it

Resolved further, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and his deputy are hereby required to attend the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, and to execute its directions; that the chairman or any member of the committee be, and is hereby, empowered to administer oaths; that each of the parties to said contest be entitled to representatives and attorneys at the recount and the taking of evidence; that all disputed ballots or records be preserved, so that final action may be had thereon by the full committee and the Senate; that the committee may appoint subcommittees of one or more members to represent the committee at the various places in the making of the recount and the taking of evidence, and the committee may appoint such supervisors of the recount as it may deem best; and that the committee may adopt and enforce such rules and regulations for the conduct of the recount and the taking of evidence as it may deem wise, not inconsistent with this resolution; and that the committee shall report to the Senate as early as may be, and from time to time, if it deems best, submit all the testimony and the result of the recount; and be it

Resolved further, That the expenses incurred in the carrying out of these resolutions shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers ordered by the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, and approved by the chairman of the committee.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a concurrent resolution adopted by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Thomas Hall, secretary of state for the State of North Dakota, do hereby set forth and certify, that the following is the full text and the whole thereof, of a certain concurrent resolution adopted by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, on the 11th day of January, A. D. 1919.

Dated at the capitol in Bismarck, N. Dak., this 14th day of January, 1919.

THOMAS HALL,
Secretary of State.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota, the House of Representatives concurring:

Whereas there is now pending before the Senate of the United States an amendment to the Federal Constitution, known as the Susan B. Anthony national suffrage amendment; and

Whereas the Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota believe that the same should be submitted to the States of this Union as an amendment to our Federal Constitution: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the State of North Dakota, through its legislative assembly, does herewith respectfully petition and urge the National Senate of the United States to favorably consider and early approve the said Susan B. Anthony national suffrage amendment; and be it

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the Senators and Representatives of the State of North Dakota in Congress.

RECESS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, January 18, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 17, 1919.

The House, under its previous order, met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We wait upon Thee, O God, our Heavenly Father, for that light that never shone on sea or shore but which illumines the mind and purifies the heart. Help us to receive it now, that we may walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called this day and all the days of our life. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2021. An act providing for the addition of certain lands to the Sequoia National Park, Cal., and designating it the Roosevelt National Park, in honor of the late President Roosevelt.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. WEEKS and Mr. HOLLIS members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Commerce.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2021. An act to add certain lands to the Sequoia National Park, Cal., and to change the name of said park to Roosevelt National Park; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14078, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14078, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of assessing and collecting the internal-revenue taxes, as provided by the "Revenue act of 1918," including the employment of the necessary officers, attorneys, experts, agents, accountants, inspectors, deputy collectors, clerks, janitors, and messengers in the District of Columbia and the several collections districts, to be appointed as provided by law, telegraph and telephone service, rental of quarters outside the District of Columbia, postage, freight, express, and other necessary miscellaneous expenses, and the purchase of such supplies, equipment, furniture, mechanical devices, printing, stationery, law books and books of reference, and such other articles as may be necessary for use in the District of Columbia and the several collection districts, $21,000,000: Provided, That not more than $500,000 of the total amount appropriated herein may be expended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for detecting and bringing to trial persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws or conniving at the same, including payments for information and detection of such violation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I direct the attention of the chairman to the description of the revenue act, for which $21,000,000 is appropriated to collect the various revenues arising therefrom. It is described as the "Revenue act of 1918." I question whether that is the proper designation of the bill that is now pending in conference.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand that that act provides that the act may be referred to as the "Revenue act of 1918." That is the reason it so appears in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that act itself provides for its designation by this terminology, of course, it is a proper description.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The clerk of the committee informs me that that is the case.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, I will withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Restricting the sale of opium, etc.: For expenses to enforce the provisions of the act approved December 17, 1914, entitled "An act to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon, all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or cocoa leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes," as amended by the "Revenue act of 1918," including the employment of agents, deputy collectors, inspectors, chemists, assistant chemists, clerks, and messengers in the field and in the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the District of Columbia, to be appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and for the purchase of such supplies, equipment, mechanical devices, and other articles as may be necessary for use in the District of Columbia and the several collection districts, including not to exceed $4 per diem in lieu of subsistence, $750,000.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to discuss some matter connected with the bill?

Mr. ROWE. Not strictly connected with the bill, but connected with the appropriations we are making. I have not asked for any extra time on this bill or any other bill recently, and I would like 8 or 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hesitate very much to enter an objection, but I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if we can finish this bill to-day or early to-morrow there will be another appropriation bill which will come on immediately, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, on which there will be considerable debate. If anyone now wishes to speak on this bill concerning matters extraneous to it, of course others will want the same opportunity.

Mr. EMERSON. Let the gentleman have the five minutes to which he is entitled, anyway.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not make objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If it will not be treated as a precedent——

Mr. MANN. It will not be.

Mr. ROWE. I do not expect to be here to-morrow.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Very well. I did not understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE] is recognized.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I feel that I should call the attention of the Members of the House to a matter which is not likely to come regularly before this body owing to the fact that the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee by unanimous action yesterday tabled House resolution 13159, a bill to authorize the purchase of all the high-power radio stations in the United States by the Secretary of the Navy and authorizing that department to carry on regular commercial business.

In the last session of Congress there was introduced a bill known as House resolution 19350, to regulate radio communications and to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to purchase a part of the radio stations belonging to private companies and situated within the United States. The bill was referred to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and extensive hearings were held during the month of January, 1917, when the Secretary of War, Commander Todd, and many of the representatives of the Navy and experts in radio appeared before the committee in favor of the bill and a large number appeared in opposition.

Among the members there was decided opposition, and the committee did not act on the measure.

About a month or six weeks ago there appeared reports in the papers that the Secretary of the Navy had purchased from the Marconi Co. their ship-to-shore business, including a large number of low-power stations on the Atlantic coast and the apparatus used on the ships equipped by the Marconi Co. When the bill 13159 introduced in this session was brought on for hearing before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, on December 12, the first witness in behalf of the measure was the Secretary of the Navy, and he stated, in answer to interrogatories, that he has purchased the ship-to-shore business of the Marconi Co. and had paid therefor $1,450,000; and that he had purchased the Federal Telegraph Co. system, chiefly located on the Pacific coast, paying $1,600,000. On being questioned as to where he got the money and the authority for making these purchases, the Secretary of the Navy stated it was in the "naval appropriation bill," under the title of the "Bureau of Engineers"; and in answer to a further question, he said, "I do not think it was itemized; it has always been a general lump appropriation."

Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the House, many bills have been introduced in Congress during the past year intended to bring about Government ownership of some public utilities. So far as I know, not a single one of these bills has received favorable consideration in the House. When I voted at the last session for the naval appropriation bill I did not intend to authorize the Secretary of the Navy or anyone else to put this Government into the commercial radio business other than during the period of the war and for a reasonable time thereafter. The very fact that the bill advocated by the Secretary of the Navy in the last session of Congress looking to Government ownership of radio was not favorably reported from the committee having charge of it should, I believe, have been sufficient notice to the Secretary that the House was not favorable to such a proposition. I should not have spoken at this time except that I fear that the Secretary of the Navy may make further purchases unless the House gives positive notice that they do not intend to hand over the legislative branch of the Government to the executive department.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Would the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Does the gentleman hold that the Secretary of the Navy had no authority to purchase the ship-to-shore business of the Marconi Co.?

Mr. ROWE. I certainly do.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I agree with you. I am very much interested in what the gentleman has been saying. Inasmuch as he is a good lawyer, I will ask, Can the gentleman suggest a remedy?

Mr. ROWE. Yes; I think that this matter should be referred to the Attorney General to recover and put back in the Treasury of the United States the money paid to the Marconi Co. and the Federal Co.

When the United States declared war against Germany all the companies doing a wireless business in the United States and on shipboard turned their plants over to the Secretary of the Navy and he has been operating them ever since. There is no excuse that can be offered for the purchasing of these stations without the full authority of Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The item under consideration is to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to enforce the act for the prevention of the sale and use of habit-forming drugs. In the act of this year $325,000 is appropriated for that service. The committee believed that it was necessary, in view of the many instances called to its attention of the increase in the number of addicts, to provide more than double the amount of the appropriation, so that the growing use of these habit-forming drugs could be checked and curtailed.

In this bill we vote two lump-sum appropriations—one of $21,000,000 and another of $4,288,000, or a total of all three appropriations of more than $26,000,000—to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the enforcement of the internal-revenue laws and the Harrison Antidrug Act.

Yesterday it was announced by the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL], and the papers of this morning and of last evening carry in bold headlines, that the national prohibitory amendment had been ratified by three-fourths of the States. It means that the National Government is going to be the police officer of the Nation; that instead of localities, small and large, seeking to enforce the State regulatory systems as to the sale of liquor that burden is to be thrown upon the National Government. Instances have been called to my attention where manufacturers are already advertising small stills for the private use of individuals in the making of alcoholic drinks for their individual use.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right now?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. LAZARO. Has the gentleman any information that he could give the House on the results of the Harrison law—the difference between the number who used these drugs before and the number who are using them now?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] has made that his special study, and I recall at the past session an occasion when he gave the House full information as to the growing number of addicts in the use of habit-forming drugs. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the brief hearing had on this item, also testified that the tendency throughout the country is for habit-forming drugs to be more greatly used. But I am calling attention to the fact that if the national prohibition law is to be enforced the United States Government will become the police officer of the Nation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How does the gentleman draw the conclusion that the exclusive burden of enforcing the intrastate legislation would be upon the Federal Government?

Mr. STAFFORD. I draw that conclusion by reason of the condition existing in many of the Southern States, where they have had so-called prohibitory legislation. They have had their private stills there. There have been instances galore where the State laws have not been lived up to, but where the burden has been thrown upon the National Government to have the law enforced. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue in his testimony before our committee stated that even as to the enforcement of the prohibitory law in the District of Columbia the great burden of that work was thrown upon his office, not upon the local police officers or those connected with the administration of local affairs. This fact, judged by the history of the attempted prohibitory legislation in the several States where they have had feigned prohibition, shows that this work is to be imposed upon the National Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Just one word more. No one can tell how large an appropriation will be required if the national prohibition law is to be enforced in communities where the sentiment is strongly opposed to that strict character of legislation.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, apropos of the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the announcement in the morning papers that on yesterday, January 16, 1919, the national prohibition amendment to the Constitution of the United States was formally ratified by the State of Nebraska, the thirty-sixth State required to complete its adoption as part of the organic law of the country, marks an epoch-making period in the life of the Republic and must take rank in history along with the Declaration of Independence, Lincoln's proclamation of freedom, the surrender at Appomattox, and the recent world victory of the American and allied armies over autocracy and absolutism in the world.

It is a moral triumph of immeasurable importance to future generations.

This House may well, therefore, to-day pause for a moment to congratulate itself on the vote of just one year and one month ago of 282 for and 128 against submitting the proposed amendment to the several States for ratification under the orderly forms provided by law.

With conscious pride, but wholly without personal prejudice against those who do not agree with me, I add to my remarks a brief quotation from the remarks I made in the House on that occasion:

I shall vote for the resolution. Therefore I only deem it necessary to explain to those friends who do not agree with me.

On the general subject of prohibition there is a decided difference of opinion in Ohio. The recent State vote on the subject was not decisive—at least was not sufficiently so to deter its friends from bringing up the subject again. But in the congressional district which for a time I have the honor of representing the majority for prohibition was large, as it was also at the previous election when the question was submitted to the voters, so that it might be said to be an instruction on this point to the district Congressman, even if he did not personally agree in sentiment.

Besides, while I have always tried to deal squarely and treat every law-abiding citizen with due respect, respecting the individual judgment of all men in my district, my own home environment, personal thought, and feelings have always been practically opposed to the use of intoxicants in any form.

Over 6,000,000 people have petitioned Congress for its submission, more than have ever before petitioned Congress on any subject.

What fair answer can be given for refusing their request for a vote on the subject? Can we say that the citizenship of the Republic is not to be trusted?

Besides, for me to refuse to so vote would be to stultify a long personal political and official record. As early as 1881, when a member of the Ohio Senate, as the journal of that year will show, I voted to submit the question of State-wide prohibition to the people of the State. The next year, 1882, as chairman of the Republican State convention at Columbus, in my opening address I personally favored prohibition, although it was not then as popular as it is now. Freely recognizing during the thirty-odd years intervening since I thus began voting on the subject the right of everyone to exercise his own individual judgment in a political way, I have never sought to hide under a bushel my own record or views, public or private.

It is too late now to begin, if I wished; too late to dissemble even if a candidate for reelection, which I am not.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall submit to Congress on the first day of its next regular session a detailed statement showing the number, designation, and annual rate of compensation of the persons employed and the amounts expended for rent and other authorized purposes in the District of Columbia from the foregoing appropriations for the collection of internal revenue.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, in my time I would like to have a letter read, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and to offer an amendment, which will be pending, when we reach page 101, line 1, relating to the Bureau of Education.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I object to any request to have an amendment pending, for the future amendment of the bill.

Mr. SEARS. I trust that the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object. I am leaving to-day on the 2.25 train on account of sickness in the family, and I shall not be here at that time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, under the circumstances, I will withdraw any objection that I might otherwise make.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF EDUCATION,
Washington, January 14, 1919.

Hon. J. W. SEARS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SEARS: In response to your request for information in regard to needs of added appropriation for the work of health promotion and physical education in the Bureau of Education, I would say the facts are as follows:

1. At present there is only one man (myself) to handle this important and rapidly expanding work. I took charge of this work last February (1917). In 11 months the requests for advice and assistance, coming from all parts of the country, have more than tripled. These are now far beyond the physical ability of one man.

Two classes of requests are predominant and indicate clearly the lines of expansion.

(1) Requests for assistance in organizing health supervision of schools—field work.

(2) Requests for advice and, to a smaller extent, for practical assistance in organizing physical training in the schools—largely office work with some field work.

A third very urgent need is for a competent secretary-stenographer.

A fourth is a travel fund especially for this work.

2. The items would stack up as follows:

Salaries:
Field organizer of school health supervision	$3,500
Organizer for physical training	3,500
Secretary-stenographer ($1,600)	1,800
Travel expenses	2,500
	11,300

3. The item in the appropriation bill involved is:

"For investigation and promotion of rural education, industrial education, physical education, and school hygiene, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere."

4. The $11,300 itemized above should be added to the amount of the current appropriation. It might be well to specify that this additional amount is to be used for physical education and school hygiene over and above the amount used this year for that purpose; and also that not less than $6,000 of this amount shall be used for personal services and expenses outside of the District of Columbia.

With this additional amount I can guarantee the effective operation of the plans for next year that we have discussed recently.

Yours, very truly,

W. S. SMALL,
In charge Division of School Hygiene and Physical Education, Bureau of Education.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as pending when we reach page 101, line 1. I have requested the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to try to be present and look after this amendment when we reach it.

Mr. MANN. What is the amendment?

Mr. SEARS. It provides for $11,300 additional.

Mr. MANN. An amendment in order to be pending must be offered.

Mr. SEARS. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to have it considered as pending?

Mr. SEARS. Yes. In compliance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, I will ask that the amendment be read, and then I will make the request that it be considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for paragraph, page 101, lines 1 to 5:

"For investigation and promotion of rural education, industrial education, physical education, and school hygiene, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $61,300: Provided, That the increase, $11,300, shall be expended for physical education and school hygiene, over and above the amount of the current appropriation used for that purpose: And provided further, That not less than $6,000 of this additional appropriation shall be used for personal services and expenses outside of the District of Columbia, $61,300."

Mr. MANN. Now, where is the amendment to come in?

Mr. SEARS. On page 101, as a substitute for the first paragraph. It simply changes the appropriation from $50,000 to $61,300.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. SEARS. That that amendment be considered as pending when that page in the bill is reached.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman, to the request that the amendment shall be considered as pending, subject to a reservation of a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Reservation of a point of order is made by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman expect to talk on this amendment when we reach it again?

Mr. SEARS. No. I shall not be here. I dislike to take up the time of the House, but I think I can truthfully say that no Member of the House has taken up less of the time than I.

Mr. STAFFORD. So say we all.

Mr. SEARS. Since I have been chairman of the Committee on Education I have tried to advance the best interests of the young people of my country. I must confess that I have found it hard to secure the passage of legislation along educational lines. When the new majority come in I sincerely trust that they will take a broader view of this question.

For 10 years before coming to Congress I was actively engaged in educational work, and I have yet to find one man, whether he is married and a father or whether he is a bachelor, who has objected to a single dollar appropriated for the purpose of bettering the conditions of the children of the United States. This small appropriation of $11,300 is asked for the great cause of child-welfare work. In my State much has been accomplished. There is much more to be done. The appropriation carried in this bill for the Bureau of Education is approximately $185,000. Yet I turn to the preceding page and find appropriated in this bill for the Patent Office $1,413,300 for the purpose of assisting the people of this country to secure patents. It is possible that when this amendment of a little over $11,000 is reached in the consideration of the bill some Member of the House may make a point of order, and perhaps the point of order may be sustained. But I sincerely trust that no Member of the House will make a point of order.

I believe the time is coming when, in addition to the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Labor, and the other members of the President's Cabinet, there will be created a great secretary of education, and that the education of the children of this country will take the place in national affairs to which it is entitled. Large appropriations and necessary appropriations are passed in this House—$500,000 for my own State—to eradicate citrus canker. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent annually for the purpose of controlling the gypsy moth, and thousands of dollars are spent to try to control the boll weevil and to protect the pig and raise it to the age when it can be called a hog. It is easy to get appropriations of hundreds of thousands of dollars for such purposes as these; but when it comes to the children of the United States Congress seems to take the attitude that we owe them nothing and that nothing should be appropriated. I sincerely trust that when this amendment comes up no Member of the House will raise the point of order, and that the amendment may be incorporated into the law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SEARS. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it will be well for the gentleman to explain briefly the purpose for which this additional appropriation is to be used.

Mr. SEARS. The purpose is fully explained in the letter. The expenditure will be under the direction of Dr. Small, who has done and is doing a wonderful work. The main purpose is to improve the health of the children in the schools, and in that way make them more able to prosecute their studies regularly, and so more effectually to become useful citizens.

I wish I could be here when this amendment comes up, but perhaps I could add nothing to what I have already said. I will not take up the time of the House further, except to urge sincerely that this amendment of only $11,000, for the benefit of the children of the country, may be incorporated in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to discontinue the offices of the assistant treasurers at Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and San Francisco from and after July 1, 1919; and section 3595 of the Revised Statutes and all laws or parts of laws so far as they authorize the establishment and maintenance of offices of assistant treasurers in the cities enumerated are repealed from and after the said date.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Thirty-five Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14078, and finding itself without a quorum he had directed the roll to be called, when 267 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he handed in the names of the absentees for printing in the Journal and RECORD.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I did not make a point of order against the paragraph read on page 62, and I desire to do so, and also against the next paragraph, beginning with line 11.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman is too late.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, surely I am not too late to make a point of order against the paragraph which has not yet been read, that beginning on line 11, page 62.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules the bill is being considered by paragraphs.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The point of order that no quorum was present was made, and the Chair sustained the point, and it was not possible for me to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make the point of order against a paragraph which has not yet been read.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is the parliamentary inquiry which I make. I want to make the point of order against the paragraph that has been read and also against that which has not been read, and I want to find out whether this is the time to make the point against the second paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can make the point of order against the paragraph that has been read, but not against a paragraph that has not been read.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Then I make the point of order against the paragraph that has just been read.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order comes too late. The paragraph was read and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] was recognized to offer an amendment, and his amendment was actually sent to the Clerk's desk when the point of no quorum was made.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I call the Chair's attention to the fact that the gentleman from California rose and offered his amendment immediately upon the conclusion of the reading of the paragraph, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] made the point of no quorum, and the Chair found that the committee was without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Being without a quorum, I had no opportunity to make a point of order and no business has been transacted since that time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman should have made his point of order before the amendment was offered.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I could not, because the gentleman from California was on his feet too quickly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maryland to make the point of order under the circumstances. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. With respect to the Chair's recognition of the gentleman from Maryland to make the point of order, as a matter of fact did the Chair recognize the gentleman from California to make the motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The facts are these: The gentleman from California was recognized to offer an amendment to the first paragraph. At that point the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] made the point of order that there was no quorum present. The Chair ascertained that there was no quorum present, and ordered the roll to be called. Strictly speaking, perhaps the point of order may be held to come too late, but under the circumstances the Chair is not inclined to deny the gentleman from Maryland the privilege of making the point of order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph on page 62, which has been read, endeavors to do away with Subtreasuries in the various cities of this country, and it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue them. It also repeals section 3595 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. I know the claim will be made that this is in order under the Holman rule, because it reduces expenses. This paragraph, however, goes further and repeals the law under which these Subtreasuries are established. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to create new offices, for which there is no law. He is not only authorized to create new officers with specific salaries, is authorized to appoint these respective officers, but legislation is also enacted for the discontinuance of these Subtreasuries. It will be noticed that it creates offices in the Treasury of the United States at Washington and that it creates offices in the Subtreasuries in the various cities; provides for bonds for these officers. A line of legislation is provided in this paragraph and the succeeding one. It may be said that this decreases this appropriation, but certainly a long line of legislation should not be enacted under the guise of coming within the Holman rule, where you decrease an appropriation and lessen expenses. It seems to me that the paragraph is clearly subject to the point of order because it creates new legislation, and they are endeavoring to hang it on the fact that appropriations are somewhat decreased. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. This whole question was thoroughly considered at the last session of Congress when this provision was up for consideration in Committee of the Whole, and the gentleman from Virginia, Judge SAUNDERS, was in the chair and made a ruling upon it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair indulge me for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am familiar with the ruling made last year, and assumed that the Chair would probably follow that decision, but before he rules upon the point made by the gentleman from Maryland, I would direct his attention to that feature of the second paragraph on page 62, which provides for an appropriation of $75,000 for certain purposes, which, if added to the expenses of making a transference of the existing offices, would mean an increase in expenditures rather than a decrease. The decision of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] was based wholly upon the fact that there was an apparent reduction of expenditures, which would bring the paragraph within the Holman rule.

That does not appear to apply as pointedly at the present time as it did then.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say in reference to the argument made before the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] last year that it was in reference to the paragraph down to line 10, embracing that subject, but it did not include from line 10 on, the balance of page 62, and the two lines on page 63, and for that reason I argued the whole question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only consider the paragraph under consideration, and is clearly of opinion that under paragraph 2 of rule 21 it shall be in order to amend when an amendment is germane to the subject matter of the bill and shall retrench expenditures—the amendment is in order. The attention of the Chair has been called to the ruling made by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Judge SAUNDERS of Virginia, when this bill was under consideration at the last session of Congress—Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, page 3226—and is of the opinion that that decision was sound, and, therefore, overrules the point of order.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 62, lines 2 to 10, strike out all of lines 2 to 10, both included, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Baltimore, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $1,900; exchange teller, $1,800; vault clerk, $1,800; clerks—2 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,400 each, 3 at $1,200 each, 3 at 1,000 each; messenger, $840; 3 watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $31,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the paragraph under consideration. The paragraph under consideration, which the Chair has held to be in order, provides merely for the discontinuance of the office of assistant treasurer at these respective places and refers to the section of the Revised Statutes which provides for the appointment of assistant treasurers at these respective places. I will not contend, Mr. Chairman, that it would not be in order, after action is had upon this amendment providing for the discontinuance of these respective offices, to offer as a separate paragraph that which is now offered by the gentleman from California, but to say that to a paragraph which seeks to abolish the office of assistant treasurers and refers to the section of the Revised Statute which merely provides for the appointment of assistant treasurers, it is possible to add an amendment providing for all the machinery for the administration of those respective offices, the Chair will see is not germane to the matter under consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct, which I think he is not, the law-making body would be put in this position, that whereas it enacts legislation which under the rules becomes existing law where parliamentary points are concerned, all that it would be necessary for any committee of the House to do would be to bring in an amendment that is germane to the Holman rule and thus prevent the law-making body from sustaining existing law. The situation here is this, that we are now operating under law made by Congress; that is to say, the existing law is literally that contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from California. The Committee on Appropriations brings in an amendment which proposes to overthrow that law. Under a point of order debate is prevented on the question of retaining existing law, because the Holman rule is invoked. There is no way of sustaining existing law under this practice except it be that the Committee of the Whole have the privilege of discussing the merits of the proposition which the gentleman from California presents. What he has offered in lieu of the committee's tender is existing law. The gentleman from Wisconsin, if his point of order should be sustained, would prevent the House from standing by its own enactment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while I have personally been in favor of the abolishment of these offices, still as a matter of parliamentary law it seems to me the amendment offered by the gentleman from California is germane to the paragraph. Here is the question: Shall we continue or discontinue the Subtreasuries? Now, the House has the right to vote upon that proposition, whether we shall continue the Subtreasuries or whether we shall discontinue them. It is true the gentleman might have moved to strike out the word "dis" in "discontinue" and then strike out the latter part of the paragraph so that would continue; but after all, whether we shall continue is germane or whether we shall discontinue. Now, the gentleman offers an amendment to take the place of the discontinuance of the Subtreasuries, substantially providing that they shall be continued and providing for salaries for them. I do not see how it can be claimed that it is not germane for the House, if it prefers to continue the Subtreasuries, to vote directly upon the point whether it shall continue or discontinue in one vote instead of requiring the House to vote twice upon the proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair will indulge me further, Mr. Chairman, I respectfully contend that the question for decision by the Chair is whether in a separate bill brought into the House from the proper committee providing for the discontinuance of these offices of assistant treasurers in the language as found in this paragraph under consideration it would be in order to provide for all the machinery of the offices, which are in existence or which may not be in existence, for the management of those offices. If the Chair will observe closely, this paragraph provides only for offices of the assistant treasurer, and the section of the statute referred to provides for those officers only. May I be permitted to read that statute:

That there shall be assistant treasurers of the United States appointed from time to time by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to serve for the term of four years, as follows—

Then giving the names of the places. It would not be in order, I contend, for any Member to arise and provide for a large number of officers other than of assistant treasurer and substitute that for the bill which is now under consideration before this committee as proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. Right at that point. Does the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] include any other appropriations than those authorized under existing law?

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Another thing. Does his amendment include anything else than in existing law?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the same phrascology as the existing law. The question now is whether the assistant treasurers shall be continued, for the very reason that in the next paragraph there is provision made for the continuation of some of the officers, clerical and subclerical positions, as provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from California. You reach the desired end by submitting to the House the question as to whether the office of the assistant treasurer shall be continued or not. It is within the privilege of any man here to move to strike out this paragraph. If that motion prevails, as I said in the beginning, it would be in order, then, for the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] to offer his amendment, either as one or separately, to provide for the continuance of these respective assistant treasurers. The question before the Chair is this, if a separate bill providing alone for the discontinuance of the office of assistant treasurer, whether it would be in order to provide for the continuation of all the machinery whereby those offices are conducted. I direct the Chair's attention to the fact that the subsequent section, section 3596, provides for the salaries of these assistant treasurers and the subsequent section provides for other authorizations for these assistant treasurers.

The one question that is before the committee under the paragraph under consideration is the continuance of the office of the assistant treasurers and not, Mr. Chairman, the help, clerical, and subclerical, that is connected with those offices. It is merely a question of abolishing the offices of the assistant treasurers as referred to in section 3595.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield? Does not the paragraph also provide for the repeal of the law which authorizes the establishment and maintenance of offices of assistant treasurers?

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not.

Mr. IGOE. It certainly does.

Mr. STAFFORD. The section referred to merely provides for these assistant treasurers. I have the statute, and I have read it.

Mr. IGOE. The paragraph as you have reported it mentions the establishment and maintenance of the offices of the assistant treasurers.

Mr. STAFFORD. The question referred to, Mr. Chairman, the only question before the committee, is whether the offices of assistant treasurers shall be discontinued or not. The House may take a direct expression on that question on a motion to strike out, and, if it is striken out, then I will say it will be in order for the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] to offer his amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will permit, I am not for these Subtreasuries, but the gentleman states there is no authorization except for the subtreasurers. It has been only a few years ago when Congress, by an amendment from the Committee on Appropriations, legalized the salaries as then existing.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I did not make that statement.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman talked about these subordinate offices. The next year they legalized all the offices then in existence, so that there was the machinery of the offices and the clerks, and a point of order would not be good on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have already stated three times in my argument that it would be in order to offer it as a separate item, not as a substitute for this provision. It is not germane to the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. MANN. As I understand my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], his position is that it might be in order now to move to strike out the paragraph and insert the salaries of the subtreasurers. It is not in order to include with that amendment a provision for the salaries of the other officials of the Subtreasuries—clerks, accountants, counters, and so forth. It would be in order, in my judgment, if there was a legislative bill on the floor of the House, with a paragraph similar to the paragraph under consideration, to move to substitute for that provision a provision for salaries for the various officers of the Subtreasuries. This is not a legislative bill. This is an appropriation bill. It would not be in order on a legislative bill to make provision for the appropriations for these offices where it merely provided for the discontinuance of the subtreasurers. But this is an appropriation bill, where it is in order to make appropriations for the subtreasurers. And if we can provide the salaries for the subtreasurers in the amendment, it seems to me that we can go ahead and in the same provision provide for the salaries of the officers necessary to maintain the Subtreasuries.

Mr. FOSTER. I call my colleague's attention to the act of March 4, 1915, which says that the officers and employees of the United States whose salaries are therein appropriated for are established and shall continue from year to year to the extent that they shall be appropriated for by Congress. So we have made them permanent.

Mr. STAFFORD. There have been some additional ones added since that. I am not making that point. I wish to say that the Chair should be guided by the position that this is a legislative provision. If we are going to have any continuity of decision, it should be the same whether it is a legislative provision on an appropriation bill or if it is offered as a separate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The paragraph in question provides that—

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to discontinue the offices of the assistant treasurers at Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and San Francisco from and after July 1, 1919; and section 3595 of the Revised Statutes and all laws or parts of laws, so far as they authorize the establishment and maintenance of offices of assistant treasurers in the cities enumerated, are repealed from and after the said date.

That provision or paragraph would be subject to a point of order as new legislation if it were not for the Holman rule, which provides that legislation may be incorporated in appropriation bills where it retrenches expenditures or decreases the whole amount covered by the bill. Manifestly, if these Subtreasuries are abolished, it would diminish expenditure. For that reason, under the Holman rule the paragraph is in order.

Now, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] offers an amendment, the purport of which is to restore provisions for the subtreasurers and the other officers and employees in Subtreasuries, all now authorized by law.

We have on the one hand the proposition to abolish the Subtreasuries and on the other hand the proposition to make provision by appropriation for the continuance of the various offices named in this paragraph of the bill. It seems to the Chair that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California is germane to the subject matter of the paragraph. On the one hand the proposition is to abolish the Subtreasuries; on the other hand to make appropriations for the Subtreasuries now authorized by law. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that Messrs. LINTHICUM, COADY, GARD, IGOE, DUPRÉ, BENSON, and NOLAN each desires five minutes, and others.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want 10 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. And the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] desires five minutes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Is the gentleman including those who favor the proposition or only those against it?

Mr. RAKER. Both. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that we have an hour's debate on this amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would like to make it less if we can. I will say to the gentleman that this matter has been so thoroughly discussed heretofore that we should not take an hour now.

Mr. DUPRÉ. That is one of the reasons why I am surprised that the committee brought it in.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That may be so, but we should not take so much time on it now.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I am wondering why the committee did not bring in its old mileage proposition and add that to the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from California suggests an hour, and I assume that the gentleman from California will agree that that time be allotted by the chairman among those for and against the proposition.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am not willing to consent to that.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want gentlemen to understand that I am for this proposition.

Mr. RAKER. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the time on this amendment be limited to an hour, the Chair to recognize alternately those for and against the amendment and divide the time equally.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That might be all right, but if we have got to divide the time equally between those for and against we might not get any time. I would like to know whether I can get some time.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not, if it is to be equally divided?

Mr. LINTHICUM. There may be more for the bill, and that would diminish our time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Maryland has such a good proposition he ought certainly to be willing to submit it to the House without extended debate.

Mr. RAKER. I think it is fair, Mr. Chairman, to have the time equally divided.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland objects.

Mr. RAKER. You will get cut out entirely if you do that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If we can not agree to this proposition it is up to the House to decide.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to proceed with this debate, if we are to be required to stay here until 10 o'clock to-night.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my objection, so far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph be limited to an hour, to be equally controlled by those for and against the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Recognition to be made by the Chair. The Member does not control any of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. One-half of the time to be used by those in favor of the bill and one-half by those opposed to the bill, and the time to be equally apportioned between them. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? I want to reserve the right to object. I understand the Chair is to recognize gentlemen. I take it, of course, that the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from California will make suggestions to the Chair.

Mr. MANN. No. The Chair will make his own suggestions.

Mr. RAKER. No. The Chair will do that himself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that those for and those against get together and apportion the time and submit requests to the Chair.

Mr. RAKER. I want to state to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that it is moved to strike out all of the paragraphs on page 62 and the first two lines of page 63.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The suggestion just made by the Chair was so unusual a one that I would like to ask if it is in accordance with the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no. The Chair will guess. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to inquire who the gentlemen are who are to get together to suggest this list to the Chair?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that a caucus could be held in the elevator.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, something might transpire here that would be of interest to the Members, and I would like to know what is going on. I can not hear what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. One hour has been given to the discussion of this amendment. The Chair would like to have some suggestion about the time each Member will occupy.

Mr. IGOE. I will state that I will relieve the Chair of five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I suggest that when the Chair recognizes a man in favor of the amendment he recognize him for five minutes and no longer.

Mr. MANN. That is all he can recognize him for.

Mr. RAKER. I think that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is the language of the present law, No. 188, Sixty-fifth Congress. The purpose of the amendment is to reestablish or to keep these Subtreasuries in operation as they now are.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the hearings on this subject of the independent Treasury, held on Wednesday, November 2, 1918, before the Committee on Appropriations, found at pages 411 to 415 of the hearings. As I read those hearings the only possible intimation is as to the reducing of the clerical force. That is found on page 411, and this significant statement appears, being found on page 415:

Mr. BYRNS. In the San Francisco office there is no change.

Mr. HUDDLESON. No, sir.

Mr. BYRNS. Have you any information which would enable the committee to reduce that force?

Mr. HUDDLESON. San Francisco asked for additional help, and for a time I think it was intended to recommend two additional clerks there, but upon further consideration the Secretary decided not to recommend an increase at this time.

The only evidence before the committee is that they need more assistance to do the actual, legitimate, necessary work in that office, and there is nothing to show that the force should be reduced.

Mr. BYRNS. Suppose the committee should decide to reduce the number of employees in some of these Subtreasuries, the work could be performed, could it not, by other agencies of the Government if it was reduced to such an extent as to interfere with the duties now being performed?

Mr. HUDDLESON. If it was reduced to such an extent that the assistant treasurer would find it impossible to keep the work current, it would be necessary to have a portion of it transferred to Washington, if it were of a character which could not be performed by a Federal reserve bank, provided the Subtreasury and the Federal reserve bank were in the same cities.

Now, the reduction of the force would transfer the work to Washington, where the Treasury is already overburdened because of so much activity, so much need for space, so much need for help, where the clerks can not be properly housed and provided for. The building in San Francisco cost the Government over $500,000. It is well equipped, well provided for. I have here a statement that shows that if this work should be attempted to be transferred to the Federal reserve bank, it would cost 20 per cent more to perform it in the Federal reserve bank than it does in the Subtreasuries; and if they could not do it there, they would have to transfer it to the city of Washington. Now, there is no evidence taken before the committee that this should be reduced, but the man who appeared before the committee stated that the work would have to be transferred to Washington if that were done. Therefore it is evident that had there been any lack of necessity, if there had been any objection to any of these Subtreasuries, the committee would have heard it, and it would have been presented, and we would have it before the House now. But, to the contrary, the only evidence is affirmative that they should not even reduce the force; that the department had been of the opinion that they should increase it, but because of present conditions they thought they would house them a little closer and do a little more work by those who are there.

This is a statement in regard to the San Francisco Subtreasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES SUBTREASURY,
San Francisco, Cal., January 11, 1919.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: According to the morning papers the appropriation bill reported to the House by the committee on yesterday made no provision for the maintenance of the nine Subtreasuries, other than the one in New York, so, as I take it, if the bill is finally passed in its present form there will be no appropriation for the Subtreasuries, other than the one in New York, for the next fiscal year.

It seems that this is the same old way by which it is hoped to abolish the Subtreasuries without direct legislation to that effect. I understand it is claimed by those opposed to the Subtreasuries that the work of the Subtreasuries can be performed by the Federal reserve banks. While this is true, it will require much remedial legislation before the Federal reserve banks are authorized to take over the work of the Subtreasuries, and it will cost the Government more to do the Subtreasury work in the Federal reserve banks than it now does to do it in the Subtreasuries, for the reason that the Federal reserve banks pay their employees much higher salaries.

During the past year I have held our little working force with a great deal of difficulty, because of higher wages held out to a portion of it by the Federal reserve bank here, and finally one of our best clerks resigned and accepted employment at the Federal reserve bank at an increase in wages of about 20 per cent; I then took the matter up with the directors of the Federal reserve bank, and asked them not to take any more of our employees, as we were working under fixed appropriation and could not compete with it or the other banks in the way of salaries.

In 1916 the San Francisco Subtreasury did the largest business in its history up to that time, but in 1917 and 1918 this business was more than doubled and discharged with practically the same working force.

The only two Subtreasuries that are housed in buildings owned by the Government are the ones located in New York and in San Francisco; this building cost with its vaults and lot, over one-half million dollars, and is suitable only for Subtreasury purposes. The Federal reserve bank here has acquired its own banking building; it has over 300 employees, and there is not enough floor space in this building for over 100 employees, if they were crowded as close together as possible, as you know it is only one story, with an alcove for the surveyor general's office.

Again, San Francisco is 3,000 miles from Washington, and this Subtreasury often represents the Comptroller of the Currency, the Treasurer of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury, as a matter of convenience, and because of the long distance and time required for transmission by mail.

Mr. SIMS, of Tennessee, who fought the Subtreasuries last session, wrote a friend of mine here that he thought an exception ought to be made of the San Francisco Subtreasury, because it was so far from Washington and the only one west of the Mississippi River.

I wish you would kindly take up this matter with the California Congressmen; also, kindly have sent me a copy of the appropriation bill as reported.

Very sincerely, yours,

WM. J. MCGEE.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] was unable to find anything in the hearings upon the present bill pertaining to the Subtreasuries for the reason that no such hearings were had. This matter was considered in the hearings upon the bill a year ago, at which time it was very extensively considered. In those hearings, beginning at page 448, very complete statements are found, and they show that there is no necessity at this time for these Subtreasuries. It shows that there is every facility for doing the work in the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. BENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. No; I can not. I have only five minutes. In that session of Congress the bill went to the Senate with the Subtreasuries eliminated. In the Senate they were put back, and while I do not want to criticize the other body, yet I believe they were put back largely for the reason that the Senators of the dominent party make the recommendations of the subtreasurers. In other words, this is nothing more or less than a desire on the part of certain Senators and others to keep certain men in office. We are expending for the Subtreasuries over $600,000, and I know, and you who have given any consideration to this question know, that it is purely a waste of the public money; and when we are putting extraordinarily high taxes upon the people is it not time that we do something in defense of the people who pay the taxes? Simply because there are people who want to be upon the pay roll, shall we continue to vote for these useless and worthless offices? The present Secretary of the Treasury has been, and I am sure to-day is, in favor of abolishing these Subtreasuries. He has voted in this House upon more than one occasion to abolish these Subtreasuries as useless and needless, and in justice to ourselves we ought to vote to get rid of them.

I take this position, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the fact that my city and the district that I represent has in it one of these Subtreasuries. We have it there, and I know the situation. I have talked with bankers and business people in my city, and I know personally there is no need, there is no demand upon the part of the banking and business interests for the continuation of these Subtreasuries. We ought to determine now to put ourselves on record, as we have done before, in favor of abolishing some of the useless offices, and help to relieve the people of these unjust and burdensome taxes. The Committee on Appropriations last year considered this matter most thoroughly and completely. The situation was examined by men who understand these things, and they went into it. They considered it from every standpoint. They considered it from the standpoint of what part of this work the Treasury Department itself could do and what part the Federal reserve banks could do, and they recommended that they be abolished, and now that we have the opportunity again I hope we will do it by such a decisive vote that even those at the other end of the Capitol will not dare to again put back these offices purely, in my judgment, for the purpose of keeping some distinguished Democrats upon the pay roll. I hope we will concur with the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague had read the hearings of last year before the Committee on Appropriations, he would have found that the department at that time recommended that these Subtreasuries be continued. Of course he himself claims that it is purely for the purpose of keeping somebody in office. I do not make any plea for that purpose, but I do say that an important agency of the Government like a Subtreasury should not be abolished without the recommendation of the department under which it comes. I do not know what the present Secretary of the Treasury would say, now that he is in office in the Treasury Department. I do know that last year the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury stated to the committee that the department is not ready to recommend that any of these Subtreasuries be abolished, and said that "to-day the position is that the Subtreasuries are performing more work than they have in recent years," and that "those in cities where the Federal reserve banks are located are being called upon to perform more work just because the Federal reserve banks are there." He added that nowhere in the world are Government funds turned over to a private institution, and that the Federal reserve banks are private institutions. I want to call the attention of the House, and especially of my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to the fact that the recommendation for the abolishment of these Subtreasuries does not come from the department, but comes from the Bureau of Efficiency, headed by Mr. Brown. He made the claim that it would result in a great saving. The strange thing about it is that the men who have been running the Treasury Department, after investigating that report, are unable to find that it will result in any saving whatever, and for the information of my friend from Illinois, who will assail this item in a few minutes, I desire to quote as follows from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury:

> I think that the estimate which the bureau makes, and which, by the way, it makes by way of estimate merely, as it says "we hazard a guess," or "we think it is possible," that a saving of $75,000 can be made is unsupported, so far as this report is concerned, by figures. I feel that the estimate is unwarranted. The best opinion that the Secretary is able to obtain is that the functions which the Subtreasuries are performing are being performed economically.

If the House wants to take the recommendation of the Efficiency Board, of course these will be abolished; and if they want to take the recommendations of the men who actually know something about the wants of the financial system of the country they will continue them. No proposition is submitted by the committee to take the place of these institutions, and there has not been presented in the hearings of this year the testimony of a single person connected either with the Government or with private business recommending that they be abolished. I submit that there will not be a saving of a single penny, because to provide vault space alone for the money that is contained in these treasuries would cost more than it costs now to pay the salaries of these people. Until the Treasury Department has worked out a careful plan and recommends that these Subtreasuries are to be abolished, I submit that this House ought to allow them to remain and appropriate for them for the coming year.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman be willing to abolish them all except the vaults? He seems to think the vault space is all that is needed.

Mr. IGOE. No; there is other work necessary. Until the Government provides for taking over this work, I do not think this House ought to act. When the Treasury says they ought to be abolished, let us do it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, when the Federal reserve act was passed it was distinctly understood that the Subtreasuries throughout the United States would be abolished. Everybody realized that the Federal reserve banks throughout the country were to be equipped to perform the functions of the Subtreasuries, and, as a matter of fact, the Subtreasuries, since the organization of the Federal reserve banks, have been an additional expense to the Government, which ought not to be continued. The mere fact that we organized the Federal reserve banks to perform all of the financial functions of the Government, and the organized banks in most of the places where we have Subtreasuries, should be sufficient argument in favor of abolishing the Subtreasuries. When an office is once created, it is the most difficult thing in the world to set it aside, and even though we now approve the report of this committee and abolish the Subtreasuries, I feel certain that when the bill goes to the Senate the Subtreasuries will be inserted again, because this is senatorial patronage, and a Senator never by any chance will let go of a job, if he can help it. There ought to be some means by which we can make the Government function along reasonable, decent business lines, and the abolishment of the Subtreasuries will certainly be a movement in that direction. We have one of these Subtreasuries in Chicago, but I have heard no one in Chicago say that it is necessary as a part of the Government activities, and even if some one did say so, I have long since reached the conclusion that the maintenance of these institutions is largely for the purpose of continuing patronage where some one has the power to appoint.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman then realizes, however, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, that the real author of this proposition is the gentleman whom he so vigorously criticized yesterday, the head of the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know about that, I shall say something about him a little later in the day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I gathered from what the gentleman said yesterday that no recommendation he could make would be followed by the gentleman from Illinois, and he is the author of this proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not quote me correctly on that; but, regardless of the recommendation made by Mr. Brown—in spite of the recommendation—I am in favor of the abolition of the Subtreasuries, and I am going to pay my respects to Mr. Brown on another topic later in the day.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio I do not understand Mr. Brown predicated his act of the suggestion of the removal of the Subtreasury from Chicago on account of the immorality of that city, or St. Louis, either?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I can not tell what his purpose was in making the recommendation; but in spite of the recommendation I am for the discontinuance of the Subtreasury in Chicago and in every other city in the United States, for I maintain we have all the equipment in the local Federal reserve banks to do the work that is necessary to be done for the Government of the United States.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But have you the legislation by which these reserve banks can take over this Subtreasury business?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; we have the legislation, but we do not need the legislation. All we need to do is to close these places that are now performing an unnecessary function.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is the gentleman positive about that?

Mr. MADDEN. And under the Federal reserve law we will find a way to do the thing that is necessary to be done to make this saving. The Federal reserve act is clear, and it was the intention when it was passed to include in its activities the work that is being done by these institutions that are an incubus on the body politic. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have no interest in the politics of this situation, if there is any politics in it. The Subtreasury in the city of Philadelphia is an ancient and time-honored institution, which our business people would like to retain. I assume that reason holds with other gentlemen here defending the Subtreasuries in other cities. Last year it was proposed we should concentrate the Subtreasury business in one city. I opposed that proposition, and I oppose the proposition to-day of concentrating the business of the Subtreasuries at the Capital City. Last year it was New York City; this year it is Washington.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is not it within the power of the President under existing law to discontinue them, if he sees fit, under the so-called Overman bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It might be.

Mr. BARKLEY. That bill only applied to the period of the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the President agrees with the quondam Secretary of the Treasury, he would not be for the abolition of these Subtreasuries. I think the best witness we have had on this entire question was Mr. McAdoo, former Secretary of the Treasury. Last year when the question was up I read from the letter written by Mr. McAdoo, December 6, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in which he said what I would like gentlemen who are opposed to Subtreasuries to-day to bear in mind. I am quoting Mr. McAdoo:

> It will be seen that the cost of maintaining these institutions, treating the Subtreasury system as a whole, is only one one-hundredth of 1 per cent, approximately, on the total transactions involved, an insignificant sum compared with the business done, the importance of the service performed, and the convenience afforded to the public. Aside from New York, the cost of maintaining the other eight Subtreasuries is $247,416.88, which is a comparatively small sum to pay for the service and convenience they provide. If these institutions were abolished, the total cost of operating them would not be saved, as a counter expenditure by the office of the Treasurer in Washington resulting from the increased work that would be thrown upon that office would be entailed.

There you have it in a nutshell. Talk about the Holman rule, talk about retrenchment, talk about economy, and urge these reasons for the abolition of the Subtreasuries, and your Secretary of the Treasury tells you they are unfounded; that you simply transfer the expense from the maintenance of the Subtreasuries that exist to the maintenance of what will be equivalent to Subtreasuries somewhere else. Where? In New York or in Washington? Heaven forbid we should concentrate them in the city of Washington. We have had enough of concentration in the city of Washington. We have had enough of centralization of official life in Washington. I am for bringing no more clerks to Washington. I am not for creating any more offices with headquarters in Washington. I am for distributing what we now have. The business men of my city insist that the Subtreasury has been a useful institution, the banks insist that it has been useful, and the Federal reserve officers of my city have testified to the value of this Government agency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I believe I was to be recognized for five minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is making a very forceful speech; we are in exact agreement, and I ask that I may yield him my time of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time will be extended for four minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Ohio.

Here is a question which we are bound to consider sooner or later. It applies in this case. Take the war-risk insurance. What did we do? In the haste of war legislation we provided an establishment that was small at the beginning but that grew to such enormous proportions, with headquarters in Washington, that to-day no Member of Congress can intelligently and satisfactorily do business with that bureau. Its clerks overlap, its correspondence is lost, its records are missing, and great suffering results to the dependents of this Government through our soldier activities in every section of the country. Would it not have been better if, sitting deliberately as we are now, we had provided that this business be distributed where we could have facilitated the work of caring for the business of our more than 4,000,000 soldiers? Yet we have concentrated it all here in the Capital; and we would like to unscramble it, every one of us. We may yet be obliged to unscramble it. It may be necessary before we get through that the complaints that come from soldiers' families all over the United States, due to governmental incompetence here in Washington, shall be answered nearer home—in Chicago, in San Francisco, in St. Louis, in New Orleans, in St. Paul, in Philadelphia, in Baltimore, in New York, or a dozen other different cities, after the method of the Federal reserve districts.

You say that this is a matter of expense; that you are going to save the Government by abolishing these Subtreasuries. How are you going to do it? By increasing the power of the Federal reserve banks? Or are you going to bring these Subtreasury agents in these various cities down here to Washington and dump them along with the rest for whom we will have to provide housing accommodations? Is that the plan? I would rather have the views of the Secretary of the Treasury upon this subject. He has been for the retention of these agencies. The one voice, except those that may be political, that we have heard urging the abolition of these agencies comes from an Efficiency Bureau, which was denounced upon this floor yesterday in unmeasured terms by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who speaks to-day, unwittingly, I assume, in support of the head of the bureau whom he denounced yesterday.

Some one has taken the RECORD that I had upon my desk, and which I had marked. I desired to quote certain extracts from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he insisted that there would be no economy in this proposition, in which he said there would be a great inconvenience to the public, and in which he urged the retention of the Subtreasuries in spite of the fact that he was at the head of the Federal reserve. I am compelled to make this quotation from memory, but I have not overstated it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this proposition has been before us heretofore and has passed the House of Representatives. In the first place, as has been stated to the committee, when the Federal reserve bank bill was pending in this House, one of the reasons urged for the establishment of the Federal Reserve Banking System was that as soon as the system was established the Subtreasuries could be abolished, and that the money which is now tied up in the Subtreasuries could be put in the respective Federal reserve banks and there become a part of the United States deposits. When the matter was first presented to the former Secretary of the Treasury he stated that he did not have time to investigate it. And then, after he made some investigation, the Secretary of the Treasury stated that he did not want the Subtreasuries at that time abolished. We then asked the Efficiency Bureau in the next bill to investigate the matter and ascertain what real purpose, what real benefit, what real service the Subtreasuries were performing, and the report to us was that they were performing no function that could not be performed by the Federal reserve banks, and that the Federal reserve banks could perform it with but little expense to the Government.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I have but five minutes.

The fact is it would be handled by the Federal reserve banks as they would handle any other deposits, and the Federal reserve banks would always be glad to get the deposits, as other banks are glad to get deposits. For whatever may be said to you, gentlemen, about its not saving money is said without knowledge of the facts. It costs $463,000 to maintain these Subtreasuries. These Subtreasuries, as a rule, are located in cities where we already have a Federal reserve bank, and it seems to me a very bad and a very poor policy to keep locked up in the Subtreasury the money which could be available for use in the country if you placed it in a Federal reserve bank. Now, that is a stronger reason for abolishing the Subtreasury than even the expense. And yet you do not only save the $463,000 by abolishing the Subtreasuries. In getting money from the Subtreasuries for the Federal reserve banks it requires additional bookkeeping; that is, bookkeeping in addition to that of the Subtreasury in the Treasurer's office here in Washington. All of those employees could be dispensed with, and if you add that to the $463,000 it will make a net saving of something more than $500,000 a year to the Treasury by abolishing the Subtreasuries. And no man has been able yet to mention any service the Subtreasury has been able to render that could not be rendered by the Federal reserve bank. When the present Secretary of the Treasury was chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, in presenting the bill, he urged that one reason for it was that it could serve a public purpose, in addition to the other services, in being able to deposit the money that was now in the Subtreasuries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed——

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am perfectly willing to give the gentleman one minute of my time.

Mr. SISSON. The House has heretofore taken the position that it now takes, but when the matter was first presented by the committee the committee did not have all of the report and all of the facts as they now have them. And the committee again recommended to the House the abolishment of the Subtreasuries for two reasons: First, the saving of the $500,000, and, second, that it makes available without any additional expense or without any additional transfer the funds available as a deposit in the Federal reserve banks that are now locked up in the Subtreasuries throughout the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations could not possibly have selected a more inopportune time to bring in this provision abolishing the Subtreasuries of the United States. Since the signing of the armistice and the cessation of hostilities there has been a great curtailment in the munition factories and in the other factories engaged in war work, and as a consequence of it there are thousands of men walking the streets of our big cities out of work. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, every day men in the Army and Navy are being demobilized, and although some of them are absorbed in the industries of the country, numbers of them are walking the streets of our cities and are idle in the country districts.

Why, then, Mr. Chairman, add to this great growing army of unemployed at this time by throwing out of employment 500 or 600 men now working in the Subtreasuries of this country—men who have grown gray in the service, men who have given the best years of their lives to the Federal service?

Now, I hear these gentlemen say that the Federal reserve banks have taken the place, or, rather, have taken over the functions, or should, rather, take over the functions of the Subtreasuries. They can not do it, Mr. Chairman. They have not the men to do it. They have not the equipment to do it. They have not the quarters in which to do it. In my own city of Baltimore, adjoining my own office, is located a branch of the Federal reserve bank. I frequently pass there in the evening, late in the evening, and I find the large force of clerks employed there working late in the night. They have not the time to take over the functions of these Subtreasuries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, some time ago I communicated with Mr. Leffingwell, one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, and he said to me it would be a calamity at this time to abolish these Subtreasuries. That has been the policy of the Treasury Department ever since I have been a Member of this House, and I know that that policy has not been changed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates about half a million dollars——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied three minutes. His colleague expected to yield one minute of his time.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I yield the two minutes allotted to me to the gentleman.

Mr. COADY. I thank the gentleman very much.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill contains a provision appropriating half a million dollars or more for the Department of Labor. That is as it should be. That money will be wisely and judiciously expended. A little later on we will have here for our consideration the Agricultural appropriation bill, which will carry millions of dollars for the benefit of the farmers of this country. That money, too, will be wisely and judiciously spent, and those appropriations should be made, and that bill will pass this House, very likely, without a dissenting vote.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the business and financial interests of the big cities, the men who have put millions of dollars into war work and charitable work, ask this body to continue the Subtreasury in the city of Baltimore and to appropriate for its continuance the sum of $31,500, not for their personal benefit, but to enable them to serve their customers, who furnish the money that makes the wheels of industry revolve and which gives employment to thousands of mechanics and laborers.

The work of the Baltimore Subtreasury has increased greatly in the past three years. In 1916 the receipts and disbursements there were over $227,000,000; in 1917 they were $314,308,732; and in 1918 they were $694,953,610.50. This vast volume of business was done at the small cost of $31,500, or less than one two-hundredths of 1 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. COADY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. In that connection, did that include the two minutes I yielded to the gentleman, and the minute which his colleague yielded?

The CHAIRMAN. He had used a minute over, and the gentleman from Louisiana yielded two minutes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I think the Chair is a very rapid calculator. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this matter involves half a million dollars, and there are only about a dozen Members present in the House. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are not in order. Under the rules it is the duty of the Chair to call the roll.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois demands tellers. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number have risen.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee and Mr. DUPRÉ to act as tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana that the committee rise.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 2, noes 60.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee declines to rise. A quorum is not present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, H. R. 14078, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 260 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill H. R. 14078, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. How does the time now stand between the two sides?

The CHAIRMAN. There are 13 minutes remaining to the gentleman, and 9 minutes remaining to the other side.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have not taken part in these debates that have been going on here for several years. I have understood that the argument was largely in favor of doing away with the Subtreasuries; but with due respect to the arguments that have been made here to-day, I do not think sufficient reason has been shown for doing away with the Subtreasuries of the United States at this time.

In the first place, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his last report, stated that he did not advise it. Secondly, the conditions brought about by the war have shown that the work of these Subtreasuries has increased tremendously.

Take, for instance, the Subtreasury in Baltimore. The daily reports show that whereas that Subtreasury had done a business of a million dollars a day the business of that Subtreasury has reached $10,000,000 in one day, and for the last six months it has averaged $5,000,000 a day. I submit seriously that an institution costing the United States Government $32,000 annually and handling a business of $5,000,000 a day would not be handling that money if it was not performing a useful function to the business of the United States, and particularly of that locality, and I understand the same condition exists with reference to the other Subtreasuries.

Gentlemen, I appreciate the argument that the Federal reserve banks might take over this work, but I respectfully submit that while it might have been understood and intended that the Federal reserve banks should do this work when the Federal reserve banks were organized, conditions at the present time, when the work of the Federal reserve banks has tremendously increased and when the work of these Subtreasuries has tremendously increased, make it at least doubtful whether we should do away with these Subtreasuries, unless we have some good reason stated by some one who can speak authoritatively, who can say that we will not be upsetting business and banking conditions by transferring all that business to the Federal reserve banks. While consolidation is frequently a good thing, I am inclined to believe you will find that you can carry it to a point where it ceases to be economy, and I believe in this case you will find that if you do away with the Subtreasuries of the United States you will increase expenditures in other departments and at the same time deprive the people of the local communities of the benefits of this privilege to which they have been accustomed for so many years.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EMERSON. Just what functions do these Subtreasuries perform?

Mr. BENSON. The functions of the Subtreasuries are to take over the customs receipts, the money belonging to the United States Government. In addition, they exchange worn-out currency for good currency and they deliver to banks and individuals pay-roll money in large quantities. They carry part of the money that would otherwise have to be shipped to Washington, to be held in the Treasury of the United States in one locality. Instead of that, by the existence of these Subtreasuries it is scattered over the United States in these nine different cities. I do not pretend to be completely posted on the matter, but I do know that the people of our community use this institution and use it to an increasing extent; and the fact that it is used to an increasing extent shows that there is no other agency now available that suits the people quite so well as this suits them. If there were, this would not be used.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition, and if I may do so I will yield two minutes of that time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair allotted five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield two minutes of that time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, when the Federal reserve act was passed in 1913 and the Federal reserve banks were organized in 1914 it was expected that they would do the business now done by the Subtreasuries. There is clearly no good reason why they should not, and, in fact, we had last year a very able report from the Bureau of Efficiency showing that the Subtreasuries have long outlived their real usefulness, that most of their original functions have been taken over already by the national banks and by the Federal reserve banks. Long ago they ceased to be the exclusive depositaries of the funds of the United States Government. We have been all of this time abolishing the Subtreasuries, chiefly because of the difficulty of abolishing a position or job once created. I spent last Monday three hours going through the Federal reserve bank in New York City. It is an enormous institution, located in the Equitable Building, spread up and down through the 36 floors of that great building. Its different departments are not on continuous floors, but wherever they could get space. An excellent location has been purchased on which, in time, the Federal reserve bank will have its own building. The Subtreasury of New York is in a fine old building where Washington took the oath of office as the first President of the United States. Perhaps it ought to be preserved as a monument of old days, but it is not serving any useful purpose to-day. That is to say, it is doing nothing that can not be done at much less expense by the Federal reserve bank. I made some definite inquiries on this subject and was entirely satisfied. Of course, in these days of liberty bonds and thrift stamps they are making such use of the Subtreasury as they can, and it is handling more business than usual, but its function as a part of the machinery of the Government is no longer necessary. In large measure it is simply a place of storage. Furthermore, to some extent the Subtreasuries are a detriment to the business of the country, because they are not banks. They take in coin and bullion and lock it up in their vaults, and nobody can borrow it. If that cash were in the Federal reserve banks it would become a basis of credit. The Subtreasuries are actually hampering business. They are out of date—long since out of date—and they ought to be abolished. Even without the Federal reserve banks we could get along without them; but with the Federal reserve banks, which were organized to take over their duties in part, there is no reason why we should keep them going. Anyone who will take the time to go through the Federal reserve banks and see what they are doing will be convinced of this in a very short time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the question of abolishing these Subtreasuries should be determined not by the possibly ill-considered report of an efficiency expert but by the men who have actual knowledge of conditions. Therefore, for the information of this committee, I read that which, to my mind, should be the controlling evidence regarding the use of these Subtreasuries. Secretary McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, the man who had these things in charge, said:

> It has been suggested that the Subtreasuries are merely conveniences and not necessities, and that their duties might well be performed entirely by the Treasury at Washington. This is in a sense true, but the cost of handling all the business from a common center in a country so extensive as the United States might be greater than the expense of the Subtreasury system, whereas the delay and inconvenience which the public would have to suffer might prove a very serious handicap upon business.

That is the statement of the man who had these Subtreasuries in charge and who had in charge the management of the general financial interests of the country. It has been said that at the time of the passage of the Federal reserve act there was in contemplation the abolition of the Subtreasuries and caring for their duties under the Federal reserve act. Clearly there was no action by the Secretary of the Treasury at that time—nor since—confirming that idea. In fact, the Treasury Department says this, and I take this from the testimony of Mr. Leffingwell:

> I have had a great deal to do with the Federal reserve banks, because they have been so active in conducting the fiscal agency operations of the Government in connection with the liberty loans, and I am sure they would expect to be reimbursed for this additional expense [subtreasury work]. Nor can I see any reason why they should not be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein the statement of the Subtreasury at Cincinnati, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the advocates of this ancient and obsolete system are driven as an excuse for its existence to point out that they were of use in the sale of liberty bonds, while every person knows that the whole burden of that campaign was thrown upon the Federal reserve banks, and there is not a particle of evidence that these Subtreasuries perform any useful function, except to the banks in the locality and vicinity where they are located.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. GARD. I just want to say that I just read that.

Mr. STAFFORD. They performed no useful purpose in the sale of these liberty bonds. Every other activity of the Subtreasuries referred to—the deposit of Government funds and the payment of checks and drafts and warrants, and they are about the only fiscal functions they are performing—is performed either by national banks or can be performed by the Federal reserve banks. Since we have established the Federal reserve system there is no warrant whatsoever for the continuance of certain of these Subtreasuries, except as is admitted by the advocates of them, that they are a convenience to the local banks. There is no question but they are a convenience to the banks where they are established for one purpose alone. It enables them to redeem their old bank notes, whereas banks situated at a distance from these Subtreasuries are obliged to pay the expressage. Here we have an institution that has grown hoary with age, and the only general purpose it serves is as a depository for some funds of the Government. The Federal reserve banks and the mints, the testimony before the committee shows, could take charge of these deposits.

Not only is there a saving of several hundred thousand dollars purposed by this amendment, but if we abolish them we rid ourselves of the demand from these centers where they are established coming to Congress for the establishment of new buildings.

It is admitted that in some of these cities the Subtreasuries are housed in buildings very old, and that they need new quarters. So that this means ultimately the saving of millions and millions of dollars. No argument has been advanced why the Subtreasury at Baltimore, 40 miles distant from Washington, should be continued, except that it is a convenience to the bankers of that locality. No argument is advanced why the Subtreasury at Philadelphia should be continued, except that it saves the banks of that city the expense of having their worn-out currency redeemed by saving the express charges. No one can justify the continuance of the Subtreasury at Cincinnati. The objection of this whole system is that you are playing favorites for the benefit of the banks of certain localities. If you are going to continue them they should be established in larger centers, like Detroit, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Minneapolis, but we not only have Federal reserve banks in the 12 regional cities, but we have established Federal reserve branch banks in the cities that I have named. There is no urgent need whatsoever why these Subtreasuries should be continued. It is a waste of public funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I realize that in two minutes it will be impossible to answer any of the statements made by those who are advocating the abolition of the Subtreasuries, and I hesitate, Mr. Chairman, to get into this debate other than to enter my protest on behalf of the business interests of my community against the abolishment of these Subtreasuries. I have listened to what the last speaker has said and I venture to predict, Mr. Chairman, that the Members of this House are willing to take the say-so of the men who control the Treasury of this country in preference to the gentleman from Wisconsin. There has been no word from the Secretary of the Treasury advocating the abolishment of the Subtreasuries of the country. There has been no demand from the Federal reserve banks of the country that they should take over this function of the financial business of the country. There has been no demand for the abolishment of these Subtreasuries except from one or two sources, and one especially that has been so severely criticized upon the floor of this House during the past two days. I am willing, Mr. Chairman, with my limited knowledge of the functions that they perform to take my word from those who know the existing conditions, namely, the Secretary of the Treasury and his representatives and the business men of the communities who are to-day protesting from every city in the country where these Subtreasuries are now established.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. I do.

Mr. PLATT. Is not Boston so large a town that nobody cares whether the Subtreasury is kept there or abolished? I do not hear anybody in New York say anything about keeping the Subtreasury there.

Mr. TAGUE. I have yet to hear one voice——

Mr. PLATT. It is only small towns like Boston and Baltimore that are saying anything.

Mr. TAGUE. Well, if Boston were to spread out and take in all of the cites and towns within 25 miles of its center in the way the city of New York has, it would also show a population up in the millions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the functions of the Subtreasuries are three in number: First, to receive deposits; second, to pay Government checks; and, third, to sell Government bonds. Those are the functions of the Subtreasuries of the United States. There are nine of them, only two west of the Mississippi River. When Mr. Glass, the present Secretary of the Treasury, was a Member of this House and brought in a bill that was finally enacted into law creating the great Federal Reserve System he said that the Federal Reserve System would perform all of the functions of the Subtreasuries, and that, if adopted, the Subtreasuries could all be abolished, and Mr. Glass is now the Secretary of the Treasury. Why do not you quote him instead of quoting Mr. McAdoo, who has ceased to have anything to do with that office? When these matters were before the House in former years Mr. Glass voted to abolish the Subtreasuries. I am surprised at my friend from Baltimore——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. No; I will not have the time.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I wish the gentleman would.

Mr. GOOD. I am surprised at the gentleman from Baltimore, representing a city only 40 miles distant, demanding the retention of their Subtreasury.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to know how the gentleman knows where it is?

Mr. GOOD. When the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] came before the Committee on Appropriations a year ago he was asked this question:

> Mr. GOOD. If Baltimore had a Federal reserve bank, would the gentleman then think they should still have a Subtreasury?
> Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say this: That if Baltimore has a Federal reserve bank, and you are going to do away with the Subtreasuries and give the power which the Subtreasury now has to the Federal reserve banks, and do it in all the cities that have Federal reserve banks, I do not know that we would object.

And that is just what this bill does. Baltimore has a branch Federal reserve bank to-day, a big institution, performing all the functions of a Subtreasury, and now here the Representatives from Baltimore object. They object to what a year ago they said would be satisfactory. Why? They object on the same ground that they objected before the Committee on Appropriations two years ago, that the banks of Baltimore would have to pay the freight or the express on their subsidiary coin used by the business men of Baltimore in case the Subtreasury there was abolished. I make the suggestion to this House that if Baltimore is to have its coin sent free, then every city in the United States is entitled to the same privilege, and I want to commend to the House the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, the minority leader, when Chicago was under fire two years ago and we attempted then to eliminate the Subtreasury at Chicago. This is what Mr. MANN said:

> We ought to find nerve enough to abolish some of the useless offices now maintained by the Government, especially when we have created other offices to do the work which they now do.

If the Subtreasuries are to be retained, I hope this side of the House will not vote to retain them. Let that side of the House that went before the people on the proposition to do away with useless offices, the salaries of which they said drain the substance of the people—let that side of the House retain these useless offices. It has been admitted by the present Secretary of the Treasury that the Subtreasuries are useless. It has been admitted by every man who has studied the question that they are useless; and just as a few years ago we abolished a great many pension offices throughout the country and consolidated them at Washington—and since that time there has been no complaint, so far as the pensioner is concerned, in receiving his pension check in due time—which resulted in saving the Treasury a great deal of money, so now we will do the same thing here. Nobody deposits money in a Subtreasury to-day; nobody goes to the Subtreasury to-day to cash a check; no one purchased liberty bonds there. All of that is done by the national banks and the Federal reserve banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes, and all the time has expired on the other side.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not care to take up the time of the committee in discussing the amendment now offered. It has been so thoroughly and fully discussed before this Congress at the last session that I am quite sure Members are prepared to vote upon the proposition.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Was not there a difference between the proposition which was tendered to the last Congress and that tendered here in regard to the date of abolition?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will answer the gentleman. When the Federal Reserve System was established every possible excuse for the existence of the Subtreasuries was taken away. There is not any question about that, gentlemen, and no man can read the hearings and reports that have been made and not satisfy himself as to the truth of that statement. Last year the committee recommended that these Subtreasuries be abolished, and, as the gentlemen from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] suggests, proposed to abolish them within a period of six months after the war had come to a close. But I submit, gentlemen, that that proposition was presented to the House simply to meet the objection of Assistant Secretary Leffingwell; and if you will read his testimony in the hearings at the last session of Congress you will find that the only real insistence that he made and the only real argument that he presented for the maintenance and continuance of these Subtreasuries was that they might be needed during the continuance of the war. The war is now over, to all intents and purposes.

Now, what is the reason for the existence of these Subtreasuries? You have heard these gentlemen from the cities where they are located, all diligent, capable, and able men; and, gentlemen, after all, the only real reason they have been able to present for the continuance of these Subtreasuries is that they will render some local convenience to the cities in which they are located.

That may be a good reason for those gentlemen who so ably represent these nine cities, but you who come from other sections of the country certainly are not under the same sort of obligation to vote out of the Treasury $500,000 simply to afford a convenience to these particular nine cities. That is the proposition, the plain proposition, that is presented to this committee.

Gentlemen, I submit there can be no good reason presented as to why these Subtreasuries should be continued any longer.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Why did the House yield, then, on the proposition?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The House yielded only after a continued and repeated session with the Senate, and only at the last moment, when it became evident that the entire legislative bill might fail unless the House did yield. There was another proposition which forced the conferees to yield. That was the fact that this House by a record vote had insisted and instructed the conferees to stand by the Borland amendment, and in order to carry out the will of the House as expressed by that record vote it was necessary for us to yield on this proposition.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Was there logrolling then?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No conference was ever held that there was not a spirit of give and take. Otherwise the two Houses never could get together on disputed propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All debate on this amendment is now closed. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LINTHICUM and Mr. DYER demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For such expenses as the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize in connection with the discontinuance of the offices of assistant treasurers, including clerks and counters in the office of the Treasurer in the District of Columbia at rates of compensation not exceeding $1,800 per annum, salaries of custodians and other employees (at rates of compensation not exceeding $2,500 per annum) at such of the Subtreasury offices as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary for the safekeeping of currency, coin, bullion, bonds, and other securities of the United States, $75,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require the custodians or other responsible employees to give bond in such amount and with such surety as he shall deem adequate for the protection of the United States: Provided further, That no person employed under a statutory position on June 30, 1919, shall be paid a salary hereunder greater than the amount of such statutory compensation on the said date.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make this motion for the purpose of vindicating the rights of the Committee of the Whole. If the point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] had been sustained a while ago, the point of order to the amendment of the gentleman from California, there would have been no possible way, except to strike out, for this main body of the House to have protected itself against the repeal of the existing law. If the Chair held, as he did hold when the point of order was made against the new paragraph, that the point of order was well taken, and then the Chair should rule in answer to the point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that the amendment which proposed to reinstate existing law was not in order, there would have been no place to go with a proposition affecting existing law. All that would be necessary under such circumstances to override existing law would be for any committee of the House to decide in the secrecy of its committee room that the Holman rule justified it and bring in a bill to put the change into effect. The gentleman from Wisconsin made the point that there was a place to go and that a Member could move to strike out. And since no one made the point of order against the motion I now ask for a vote on the motion to strike out, since it is the last recourse in the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental and contingent expenses, including new machinery and repairs, wastage in the melting and refining department and in the coining department, and loss on sale of sweeps arising from the treatment of bullion and the manufacture of coin, $75,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether there is any information before the committee as to the purpose of the Government to establish a mint in Mexico?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; we have received no such information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No suggestion that any mint should be established in our neighboring country?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I asked the question because it seems to me pertinent in view of the interest that is being taken by the Bureau of Information as to Mexico. Members of Congress, I presume, are favored, as some other citizens are, with communications from the Bureau of Information which show an unusual interest in Mexico. Yesterday some reference was made to the quality of paper on which the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is printed. I took occasion to say that the paper upon which the RECORD is printed and sent out to those recipients of it who are on the lists of Members of Congress was a disgrace to the body and that the excuse that the cost of paper was high was a poor excuse in view of the fact that the Bureau of Information was sending out literature of all sorts in great volume on glazed paper superior to that upon which the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was printed.

Now, the Bureau of Information has a good deal of influence at the White House. We have been told that it did not intend to come to Congress for any more money. The supposition is that it depends upon that $100,000,000 fund which Congress dedicated to the President some time ago for such use as he might see fit to make. But just why the Bureau of Information should publish a weekly news bulletin in Mexico has not yet been made clear. It may be another step toward creating a world democracy.

We have information that much literature, some of it commendatory of the administration, was dropped over the German lines during the war with a view to informing the democracy of Germany of American intentions. Now comes a "Weekly News Bulletin" from Mexico, under date of January 9, 1919, issued by George Creel, chairman, from the headquarters of the "Mexico section, Robert H. Murray, director; office, Filomeno Mata, 17 Apartado Postal 128 Ris," which indicates we have established a publication office down there.

Can anyone tell—can the chairman of the committee tell—why we are spending American money in this way, especially when there is such a fierce demand for economy, for the abolition of Subtreasuries, for the throwing of people out of employment in one section and concentrating them in another section? Can anyone tell why we are using a part of the President's $100,000,000 fund for the purpose of conducting a publicity service in Mexico? What sort of a propaganda is this? To what lengths do we go with the money of the people?

I thought possibly the chairman might tell us that this was the forerunner of the establishment of a Subtreasury in Mexico, or of a mint in Mexico, or an assay office in Mexico, or of some oil company's headquarters in Mexico. What is behind it?

Mr. MADDEN. There might be war in Mexico. You can not tell. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the purpose is to stop a war with Mexico, well and good. We spent a lot of energy and money in marching into Mexico and out again, and then the President came in and asked us to appropriate $125,000,000 to pay the bill, and we appropriated it.

What kind of a proceeding is this new one? Why is it necessary for us to print a daily report of the proceedings of the legislative assembly in Mexico? Why is it necessary for us to print information respecting the operation of oil wells in Mexico? Why should the money of the people of the United States be spent printing a paper in Mexico when paper is so scarce in the United States that we have got to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on stuff that falls to pieces when you pick it up?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I simply ask the question, Mr. Chairman. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental and contingent expenses, including rent of building, $5,700.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think I owe to the House an explanation of the case that was called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations by Mr. Brown, in which he said there was some doubt as to the morality of the location in which the woman resided, and I looked up the record on file in my office in that case, and I find these to be the facts: The case referred to by Mr. Brown was that of Mrs. Amazonia Franklin, whose allotment matter I have been trying to get adjusted for months. After her husband went to the war she had to leave the place where they were living on account of the expense and the further fact that the Bureau of Insurance had not sent her any money. The allotment case was mixed up, on account of some technicality, and was referred to Chicago for special investigation. The investigators went to the address given in the papers relating to Mrs. Franklin's case, and they could not find her. They reported to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance that the house was a disorderly house. The fact of the matter is that it was a boarding house. This was merely a supposition on the part of the inspector who made the report. There was no proof that this house was disorderly, and absolutely nothing has ever been proved against Mrs. Franklin.

Mrs. Franklin later left this address, and, as far as I know, has ever since that time been the subject of charity on account of the negligence or failure of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to adjust her claim, although I have a letter from them which I received several months ago, stating that Mrs. Franklin could look for a check from the Government within a week or 10 days, but up to this time she is still waiting, and has not had a dollar.

But aspersions have been cast upon her character by the Government investigators who ought, instead of doing that, to have furnished her with the funds necessary to keep her from starving and being the object of charity.

Now, Mr. Brown seemed to go a good distance out of his way to call this case to the attention of the Subcommittee on Appropriations in executive session, and incidentally to call attention to the fact that this was one of the cases for the settlement of which I was pleading, intending it to be inferred, I assume, that there was something wrong about the case. I happened to look Mr. Brown up since I spoke to the House yesterday, and I find that the Department of Justice has a good deal of information about Mr. Brown that would make very interesting reading. And in connection with that I may say that I may feel called upon to get the evidence which the Department of Justice has on file one of these days and present it to the House. But in the meantime, so as not to take up too much of the time of the House, I think I will give the House one of the first installments of the information I have and which is on file.

Mr. Brown is employing a woman by the name of Mrs. Johanna Schoenfeld, the wife of Dr. Schoenfeld, of the George Washington University, who is a pro-German from his toes to the top of his head. This woman is employed at a salary of $1,200 a year as assistant cook to help in the kitchen of the War Trade Board. Now, Mr. Brown, of course, has jurisdiction over the efficiency of the War Trade Board. This is the way he helps to make it efficient. She is using a Government automobile that comes up to her house about 10 o'clock every morning and takes her to her work, and takes her back about 4 o'clock and waits around until 5 or a little after and takes her back. This is the way he helps to make it efficient. The people in the neighborhood where she lives—at Thirty-fourth and Ordway Street—all understand this situation. I am not telling anything in executive session. I am not telling anything that the people in her neighborhood do not understand. This woman, before she got her house back from the occupants who had it, was living at Mr. Brown's house. Brown had a daughter in Germany at the outbreak of the war studying, and he used all kinds of means to get her back, and a man who came over on the same ship that she came on expressed the opinion that he would like to throw her overboard on account of the various pro-German expressions which she uttered.

The Department of Justice has a record of the activities of Dr. and Mrs. Schoenfeld. Mrs. Schoenfeld has two sons in the Consular Service who were never called for military duty. This is the woman who is employed through the influence of Mr. Brown as an assistant cook in the War Trade Board, at a salary of $1,200 a year, and the use of a Government automobile that comes after her to her house, takes her down to the War Trade Board, where she remains about an hour, and then takes her back, and then waits for her for another hour and takes her back again.

Mr. BARKLEY. Can the gentleman tell us whether the War Trade Board is running a boarding house?

Mr. MADDEN. They have some kind of a cafeteria, I believe, at which they supply food to those who are employed there.

There was a housewarming at the Schoenfeld house last night, and at 10 o'clock p. m. an official Government car was standing in front of the house, and a man in uniform is said to have been working in the kitchen. Mr. Brown, I understand, is the sponsor through whom Mrs. Schoenfeld is employed; and if the statements that I have made are thought by Mr. Brown not to be true I want Mr. Brown to invite me to produce the evidence, which is on file in the Department of Justice, not only in connection with this case but in connection with other activities of Mr. Brown during the war.

Mr. Brown is the last man who ought to be kept on the Government pay roll. He not only has proved himself by his actions as a citizen during the war to be unworthy, but by his work as a so-called efficiency expert to be unworthy.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask my colleague a question, not pertaining to this particular case, but there has been so much said about it that I think there ought to be a statement put in the RECORD. I want to ask my colleague if he understands the law to be that a wife or mother must have a certain standing of moral character to be passed upon by any official in the United States Government before she is entitled to an allotment or allowance under this law passed for her benefit?

Mr. MADDEN. My understanding is that the only thing that is required of them is that there shall be a soldier in the service of the country; that the soldier shall have made an allotment of his pay, that the allotment shall be in proper form, that it shall be made to the wife, or to the mother, or to some other relative; that if it is made to the wife under the law it is obligatory upon the Government to pay the allotment, and also to accord the allowance, and that it is not the function of Mr. Brown or anyone else to discredit those who wear the uniform of their country, who defend the flag, that it is not the function of Mr. Brown or anyone else to disgrace or discredit the wife of a man wearing the uniform of his country; that it is no part of the business of Mr. Brown or anyone else connected with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to discredit a mother who has given her boy to her country. If Mr. Brown had been one-half as patriotic as the man whose wife has been charged with living in a house the character of which he said was to say the least shady, there would be no such statement made by him. I maintain that everything Mr. Brown has done from the opening to the close of the war has been more pro-German than anything else, and that all his associates have been pro-German, and he above all men is the last who should come behind closed doors to a committee of this House and make any statement about the character of the wife of an American soldier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has made a very serious and a very severe attack on Mr. Brown.

Mr. MADDEN. I will make some more of them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hold no brief for Mr. Brown, but I do feel that we ought to be very careful before we take occasion upon the floor of this House to attack any citizen of this country who has not the privilege of appearing here and making his own defense. The gentleman takes umbrage because the War Risk Bureau has seen fit to make inquiries concerning the moral character of persons to whom allowance checks are sent. There are more than 4,000,000 on the rolls. These investigations are necessary under the law, and for my part I would not be willing to have the United States Government pay any amount out of the Treasury to any immoral woman as a contribution toward her support.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is assuming that the case is one in which immorality has been shown. I maintain that it has not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, the gentleman is commenting on the case to which he refers. I am speaking generally. I know nothing of that case. I never heard the woman's name until the gentleman from Illinois read it here a moment ago, and if any publicity has been given to an attack made upon the woman to whom he has referred then it comes from the gentleman from Illinois, because there is no record of it in the committee, and her name has never been mentioned upon the floor of this House until the gentleman from Illinois mentioned it.

I repeat, I do not know the name of the woman; I do not know whether the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken or not in his reference to that particular case, although I am sure he thinks he is certain about it. But, as I was about to say, the Pension Bureau has always made an investigation concerning the moral character of the people who receive pensions at the hands of the Pension Bureau. I say that it is a correct policy. The War Risk Bureau has done nothing more than its duty in making investigations in this regard.

Mr. FIELDS. But the allotment part of this fund is not a pension; it is a part of the soldier's pay.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, I am not referring to the allotment. If the gentleman had listened to me, he would know that I said allowance. Of course, a soldier has a right to do what he pleases with his own money.

Mr. MADDEN. I just want to ask the gentleman if he thinks there can be any justification for keeping a woman in a starving condition for months by failure to deliver the money they have collected out of the pay of her husband, the soldier.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think there ought to be any greater delay than is absolutely necessary, and I am willing to state there have been a great many delays in a great many cases we have not been able to understand; and I dare say that if we are fair, if we would look into it, we would find that in many cases there is a good reason for at least a part of the delay. As was said yesterday, here are 4,000,000 cases in the hands of this War Risk Bureau, cases that came up not gradually, as in the case of insurance companies, but business that was dumped upon the bureau all at once. It was a stupendous job, and it is not surprising that in some of these cases possibly there have been delays.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] refers to some employee in the War Trade Board, and he seeks to hold Mr. Brown responsible for that. Mr. Brown has no connection with the War Trade Board. He has absolutely no authority there, either to put anybody on the rolls or to take anyone off the rolls. The Bureau of Efficiency has never been called in to investigate the War Trade Board; and even if it had been that fact would have given Mr. Brown no authority to employ anyone there. I suspect that the gentleman from Illinois has mixed up the Mr. Brown to whom he refers with some other Brown, possibly down there in the War Trade Board.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Then I take it Brown is in town. He seems to be.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He seems to be, from what has been said on the floor of this House in the last few days.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlemen from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman refers to the fact that an automobile has been used to transport this employee, whose name I can not recall, to and from her home to the War Trade Board. Mr. Brown is not responsible for that. If that be true, and I am not questioning the fact that the gentleman from Illinois has received the information—though how true the information is I do not know—then some official ought to be held responsible for it. If the statement made as to the use of an automobile on yesterday evening is true, the fact ought to be shown and the official who is responsible for permitting the Government automobiles to be used for purposes of that kind ought to be exposed and such action taken as is proper in the case. But I submit, in all sincerity and in all kindness, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that he ought not to permit his evident antipathy to Mr. Brown to impel him to make statements on the floor of the House which may and, I think, clearly do Mr. Brown a very grave injustice.

Mr. GOOD. As I recall, we have never given the Bureau of Efficiency an automobile, and that bureau has no automobile.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct. The Bureau of Efficiency has no automobile, never has had one, and can not purchase one out of the appropriation carried in this bill. They have never asked for an automobile.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of War, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; Second Assistant Secretary, $4,500; assistant and chief clerk, who shall sign such official papers and documents as the Secretary may direct, $4,000; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; clerk to the Secretary, $2,000; stenographer to the Secretary, $2,000; clerk to the Assistant Secretary, $2,400; assistant chief clerk, $2,400; disbursing clerk, $2,750; appointment clerk, $2,250; 4 chiefs of divisions, at $2,000 each; superintendent of buildings outside of State, War, and Navy Department Building, in addition to compensation as chief of division, $500; chief telegrapher, $1,800; clerks—6 of class 4, 7 of class 3, 15 of class 2, 20 of class 1, 5 at $1,000 each, 2 at $900 each; foreman, $1,200; carpenters—1 $1,200, 1 $1,080; chief messenger, $1,000; skilled laborer, $1,080; 6 messengers; 9 assistant messengers; 2 telephone switchboard operators; 8 laborers; 2 chauffeurs, at $840 each; in all, $151,380.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information from the gentleman in charge of the bill. Prior to April 6, 1918, there was provision made by law for a Secretary of War and an Assistant Secretary of War. In an act approved April 6, 1918, a Second Assistant Secretary of War and a Third Assistant Secretary of War were authorized. Yesterday the Secretary of War appeared before the committee, of which I am a member, and asked for the passage of a bill which contains, among other things, the following provision:

So much of an act of Congress approved April 6, 1918, as provides for the office of Second Assistant Secretary of War and Third Assistant Secretary of War is hereby repealed.

In the gentleman's bill to-day we find appropriations being made for the Secretary of War, an Assistant Secretary of War, and a Second Assistant Secretary of War. My query is, What is the basis that the gentleman used for his appropriation? If he used the old law, he should have included only a Secretary and an Assistant Secretary. If he used the present law, he should have put in a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, a Second Assistant and a Third Assistant. If it is anticipated that the bill proposed by the Secretary of War on yesterday be passed, then he would not need to appropriate for the Second Assistant Secretary.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As the gentleman knows, the Committee on Appropriations in making these recommendations for appropriations tries to follow the law. The law provided for a Second and a Third Assistant Secretary of War, and the committee, following the law, was prepared to make that recommendation, but upon inquiry of the Secretary of War or of his office it was stated to the committee that they did not desire an appropriation for the Third Assistant Secretary of War, but that they did want an appropriation for the Second Assistant Secretary of War. That was the reason the committee dropped the Third Assistant.

Mr. TILSON. So the gentleman did not follow the law in the case?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. We would have done so had we not been notified that they did not need a Third Assistant Secretary of War. Since they themselves said they did not need such an official, of course we did not recommend it. We did recommend a Second Assistant, because the law provides for him, and they told the committee they needed him. If they have stated to the gentleman's committee and have requested the passage of a bill abolishing the office of the Second Assistant Secretary, I shall offer no objection to an amendment which strikes that out of this bill.

Mr. TILSON. I hold in my hand a bill introduced on yesterday by Mr. DENT, by request—and by request in this case means by request of the War Department—the bill from which I read, which abolishes both the Second Assistant Secretary of War and Third Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is that asked for at once or after a certain date, or is that based upon some reorganization of the Army?

Mr. TILSON. It is based upon the reorganization of the Army, but I am frank to say to the gentleman that there does not seem to be an immediate prospect of the bill becoming a law. Therefore I do not propose to strike out the provision that the gentleman has made in this bill, and I would be more inclined to move that he insert an appropriation for a Third Assistant Secretary of War, so as to comply with the law as it now stands.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill would have carried a provision for the Third Assistant Secretary of War, in accordance with the law, had not the committee been informed by the Secretary of War's office that they did not need such an official during the next fiscal year.

Mr. TILSON. Undoubtedly that statement is correct, and if they do not need such an official during the coming year, on the gentleman's statement, I think he would be justified in leaving it out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to move an amendment to the section under consideration by striking out the words "chief telegrapher," in line 21, page 67.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MASON: Page 67, line 21, strike out the words "chief telegrapher, $1,800."

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, it would seem from the news we get from the peace conference that we will have but little use for telegraphers. It seems that the main points demanded by the President of the United States, accepted by our allies and approved by our enemies, whereby we were to have open treaties made in an open way, has been abandoned in some way; and it has occurred to me that, a majority of the House belonging to the same political party of the President, and, in fact, every Member of Congress, either in the House or the Senate, standing back of him on that proposition, it would be wise for those in power to present a resolution to let these people know that the American people and the American Congress are backing the President in demanding no secret negotiations as to our treaties of peace. [Applause.] As a matter of fact, the very first and strongest point made by the President, and made wisely, was to demand that if this war was won, and we sacrificed the blood of our sons, not only that he would stand for a permanent peace—and he is doing it—but that he would fight that thing which has brought war ever since war was invented; that the secret negotiations of kings, queens, emperors, and politicians all over the world should cease. The President of the United States has demanded it, we have accepted it, and to-day the people, the 100,000,000 of American people, are shocked with the idea of secrecy. We believe and the people know that if that is left open, so that the people can hear from day to day and hour to hour what our allies are demanding and what we are demanding, that there will not be so much of selfishness, that they will not make propositions each to the other that shall give them the right to govern people without their consent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest this in good faith: That if some one upon the majority side will give us an opportunity to stand back of the President I believe it will strengthen his hand so he can say to them that he has stood for these open negotiations; that it is the first point necessary that his constituents, 100,000,000 of people, are back of him in this demand; that we are going to put aside partisanship; and that we are going to stand on the threshold of the greatest opportunity that has come to us in all of this generation. If they will propose a resolution saying that the American people, who went into this war willingly and made these sacrifices, want to know what is being demanded, they want to know that the blood of their sons has been spent, not to put the flag of one nation over another, not that one empire may boast of having changed colonies from one empire to another, with a new master and a new flag—I say, if they will give us the chance to vote for a resolution, I do not believe there is a man in either branch of this Congress but who will stand back of the President and vote for the passage of such a resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Temporary employees: For the temporary employment of such additional force of clerks and other employees as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary to the prompt, efficient, and accurate dispatch of official business in the War Department and its bureaus, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to such bureaus and offices as the exigencies of the existing situation may demand, $4,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress on the first day of its next regular session a statement showing by bureaus or offices the number and designation of the persons employed hereunder and the annual rate of compensation paid to each: Provided further, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $5,000 per annum, not more than 5 persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,400 per annum each, and not more than 25 persons shall be employed at a rate of compensation in excess of $1,800 per annum each: Provided further, That detailed estimates shall be submitted by the War Department in the annual Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1921 for necessary services of the character provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman in charge of the bill, and I would like to be brief about it, what is the special occasion of the increase of $6,000,000, an increase of 150 per cent in the allowance for temporary employees in the War Department. I believe the deficiency estimate, if I recall rightly, is $6,000,000 for the current year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is a reduction of some 75 per cent.

Mr. MANN. This is a reduction. I said increase. I meant reduction. What is the occasion of that, in view of the fact that you can not get anything done by the War Department, and they seem to be behind on everything?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I do not think some of the bureaus are very far behind, or at least I have not found that to be the case. I have always found pretty prompt action in the office of The Adjutant General, for instance, and other bureaus.

Mr. MANN. I occasionally get a communication from The Adjutant General, generally a form letter, telling me to apply somewhere else for the information. Of course it is not very difficult to take care of correspondence on that basis.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There has been no delay of any great extent of which I am aware unless possibly it be in the payment of some of the allotments by the Quartermaster's office, and which is due, I take it, largely to the conditions which arose on account of the transfer from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. I might say that the recommendation of $4,000,000 is based upon the estimate of $5,940,000 which was submitted by the Secretary of War in his revised estimate.

Mr. MANN. Did not the Secretary of War recently submit an estimate for $6,000,000 deficiency appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In addition to the $10,000,000 that was carried last year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and if that is granted it will make more than $16,000,000 that will be expended during the present fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. That is what I am trying to get at. Here is the Secretary of War who has an appropriation of over $10,000,000 now for temporary employment. He has asked for $6,000,000 more between now and June 30, and yet the gentlemen of the committee propose to reduce the entire allowance for the next fiscal year to $4,000,000. If the Secretary of War needs $6,000,000 between now and June 30, in addition to half of $10,000,000 already allowed, I should think that he would need more than $4,000,000 in the 12 months following June 30.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I may say to the gentleman that the revised estimates which were submitted to the committee were submitted on the basis of an army of 500,000 men, which officers who appeared before the committee stated it was hoped would be authorized by Congress.

Now, The Adjutant General has put on a great many additional employees recently. He has put on a thousand employees in the casualty division alone, and he is asking for another thousand employees in the casualty division. I understand there are about 3,500 employees in The Adjutant General's office at the present time, and he is asking for more in order to get out this information to which the gentleman refers as promptly as possible.

Mr. MANN. I have noticed there has been no great exodus of Government clerks from Washington such as we contemplated would happen when we passed the bill providing for their transportation expenses. We get printed reports every day or two from some department as to the number of men who have been employed and discharged within a recent period. I think the one I saw this morning came from the Department of Labor, which had over 10,000 employees, and the number employed during the last 30 days prior to the making of that report exceeded the number discharged. There have not been very many discharged from the Government service yet.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I confess I have been very much disappointed myself in the fact that there has not been any greater reduction in the force. I understand the War Department has reduced its force about 2,500 persons, and about a thousand of them have been reemployed in The Adjutant General's Office in the casualty division, to which I have just referred. There has been an increased demand for clerks in connection with the division of loans and currency in the Treasury Department and in the registrar's office, and possibly other bureaus which have to do with the auditing of accounts, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman happen to know who has charge of the distribution of bonds subscribed for and paid for by soldiers in the Army?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The division of finance in the Quartermaster's office.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows there is very bitter complaint that bonds can not be obtained—bonds which have been fully paid for?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. There has been some delay in sending some of those bonds out. I have had some cases called to my attention.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the discussion as to the salaries and the provision for their payment brings us to the revenue question, and I would like to call the attention of this committee to a communication I received from an important manufacturer in my district, and I hope, if there are members of the Ways and Means Committee present, that they will take note of what I am about to read. In fact, I take it for granted in pursuance of their duties and in their alertness and activities that they are familiar with this question, but it has seemed new to me, at least this later phase, and I hope the country also may take note. This is in reference to the leather trade. It says:

Some mail advices from England are not very encouraging regarding the possibility of the import embargo for leather being lifted there in the near future, and some parties state that it may be six months before this occurs, or possibly longer, but the general opinion here is that the embargo will continue until the British buying commission completes, which it is expected will be made before long.

Now, it seems that notwithstanding Uncle Sam has been the world's great benefactor, the great helper, with a mighty heart that has poured out lavishly to the oppressed of the world the resources of this country, that we see here before the war is scarcely over, before the treaty of peace is signed, England preparing to take care of her trade. This is what my correspondent thinks about it. This is the voice of a layman. It is the voice of a man who has built up a great business under the encouragement of the beneficent laws of this country. You will have a great opportunity, my young friends [referring to Congressmen CAMPBELL and LONGWORTH], to display your talents in correcting this great evil, and seeing to it that the embargo is withdrawn. This is what the young gentleman thinks about it:

> You will see from the inclosed underlined market letter that the English are putting their "silent tariff"—

Silent tariff! In these days of publicity so loudly proclaimed by our distinguished President that there is to be no more secrecy in the relations between the nations, that all cards must be upon the table, that there must be justice and equality everywhere, we see England putting on a "silent tariff" against American leather producers. They have a trust in the shape of a buying institution there, evidently. He says, further:

> Their buying commission purchases collectively and unless one sells to them it is impossible to get a permit from the British Government to ship. It looks gloomy enough for leather-export business there at a profit.

It looks gloomy enough for the leather-export business, indeed, and our leather manufacturers may be compelled to finally close up and surrender to the alert Britishers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know that we have a War Trade Board in Washington that is supposed to take care of American interests in leather?

Mr. FOCHT. I have not found that they have accomplished anything, excepting that one of these boards put out of business hundreds of prosperous newspapers in the country, uselessly spent a lot of money, and tyrannized over those that survived.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that we do have a War Trade Board, whose chairman is now in Europe, probably in close juxtaposition to what is going on. The statement was made on the floor the other day that by reason of the activities of the United States to extend our trade in Russia a corporation had been formed——

Mr. FOCHT. That is Mr. McCormick.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I mention no names.

Mr. FOCHT. Let us mention names. Let us have it all wide open, with "the cards on the table." That would be the right way and the popular way. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This gentleman is the head of the War Trade Board, and the War Trade Board, as I understand, has been working in cooperation with the British consuls in the United States.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; and we should find out what those fellows have done with all this money while Great Britain built up her foreign trade and shut out American leather under her foxy "silent tariff" embargo policy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And they do not permit the people who contemplate shipping goods abroad to export goods or to get in touch with the world's markets without the consent of the War Trade Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I have another matter relating to a different phase of the situation which I wish to refer to if the House will give me another minute or two or five.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. I thank my colleague. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] has just amplified some questions here, and he always illuminates every subject he discusses. It should be remembered that there were some of us at least on the floor of this House who approached the war in what we thought was a statesmanlike way, and that was with caution, but we voted for war and sustained it throughout, and the war was won. The question has often been asked, Why did you vote for war? I will tell you why I voted for war. I believed then that there would be brought about a wider extension of human liberty in the world and a guaranty of future peace. That is the reason why I voted for war, and I hope I may not be disappointed.

Now, then, presuming that we are to have no more war, if we are going to abandon that method of settling disputes, then how is it to be brought about unless we disarm? Disarmament would at least indicate good intentions on the part of the nation. Another thought I wish to briefly call your attention to. Here I have a direct contradiction of that whole program of future peace. We may extend human liberty; it may become wide flung throughout the world; but, as to this much-vaunted guaranty of peace, does it look as if we were preparing for peace? Not only has the Secretary of the Navy called for the largest navy ever known in the world—and that does not look like approaching peace—but when we see a condition and a situation in Pennsylvania, such as the one I will describe here in the short time I have, it is evident that it is time for Congress, and for this Congress, to take note. I want to read this to you from a correspondent of mine. This letter is written from the progressive and booming town of Mount Union, Pa., where great munition works are located. My correspondent writes:

> So long as war explosives are based on nitrates, I believe it would be a good thing for the United States to own some of the powder plants, to hold the equipment together. The Aetna plant here has a lot of very valuable, intricate equipment which I understand must be sold for scrap. The Japs had four men here a week ago to look over the plant, and offered some of the foremen enormous salaries for a two-year contract to erect this plant in Japan, provided they bought it.

That is all. You may draw your own conclusions. Those who are in a position to act should do so, if we are going to have peace in the future. But it does not look to me as though it was going to be guaranteed by Japan, since they come here and want to buy this munition plant and erect it in their own country—not to make stockings, not to make shirts, but to make the things that kill people; and that makes, of course, for more war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state who is the writer of the letter?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; Mr. E. M. Greene. He is a patriot and one of the best and most prominent business men in central Pennsylvania.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Has not the Government boosted the leather business enough by buying a million saddles when it has only 130,000 horses to put them on? Why do the leather men complain?

Mr. FOCHT. Because they have not had the opportunity to sell their leather or to export it, simply because England has monopolized the trade. If anything has been expended for that purpose it is up to those in charge of the department to explain what has become of the money. And possibly the saddles were bought and made in England, while American leather remained here on account of Great Britain's "silent" embargo against us.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman think a million and some odd saddles are enough to permit the putting of one saddle on the back of every hobby that this administration has been riding? [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. Yes, possibly; but riding on to further party destruction. [Laughter.]

INTERESTING COMMENTARY ON POLITICAL METHODS.

[By A. Boyd Hamilton, in the Harrisburg Telegraph, Jan. 15, 1919.]

Publication of the table of the official vote of 1918 for congressional honors in the seventeenth, or "shoestring," district, as compiled by the return judges at Lewistown, affords an interesting commentary on the way the voters of the eight counties of the district regarded the war by Democratic National Chairman Vance C. McCormick, his newspapers, and his partisans and the horde of Federal officeholders against Congressman BEN FOCHT. In 1916 Congressman FOCHT, in a campaign marked by straight fighting on both sides, won over George A. Harris, the Fulton County cog of the Democratic machine, by 1,255. In 1918 Congressman FOCHT was assailed by McCormick with all the poison gas that could be assembled and opposed by Senator Scott S. Leiby, the personal hand-picked candidate of McCormick, to show the President that if the national chairman could not muster up a candidate for Congress in his "home" district he could elect one in the district "across the Susquehanna." The result was that FOCHT won by 5,414. This, too, in face of the fact that Leiby, in addition to having the McCormick nomination, was also the candidate of the Prohibitionists. In spite of the strenuous efforts of McCormick and his crew FOCHT carried every county except Fulton, and only lost that by 20 votes. FOCHT's total vote was 16,762 and Leiby's 11,348.

Another interesting fact in connection with McCormick's fight against FOCHT is that every one of the eight counties in the seventeenth elected a Republican legislator, even Fulton choosing an out-and-out Republican for the first time in years and the Democratic seat in Juniata being lost. In the whole seventeenth district the only surviving Democratic legislator is Leiby, who was elected by an accident in 1916.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois interrogated the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] a while ago in regard to these temporary employees, for whom $4,000,000 is requested. I rise to support the gentleman from Tennessee, who recommends this appropriation, because I am inclined to think the War Department needs more help. It needs help for various branches of the service—for ordnance, for aviation, and for one other department that we do not often discuss on this floor, namely, the Judge Advocate's Department.

A few days ago, when another bill was under discussion and the question of appropriation was up, I called attention to the fact that the report made by the Hon. Charles E. Hughes at the instance of the President, in the matter of the aircraft appropriation of $640,000,000, had contained a recommendation that one Col. Deeds be court-martialed for offenses against the proprieties in the matter of his connection with business concerns and business partners while he was holding the office of colonel and was in a position to get information in regard to contracts that were gradually using up the $640,000,000 for the expenditure of which a Senate committee reported that we had not secured a single fighting plane for use in the war upon the other side of the water.

The report of the Senate committee was an indictment of those who had in charge the expenditures of this $640,000,000 which we so cheerfully appropriated to further the war and to put our boys on the other side in a position to fight. The Senate committee said that the $640,000,000—enough to run this Government for a whole year before the war—had not produced a single fighting plane in France, and therefore our boys over there waiting to use these planes were twiddling their thumbs or swelling the casualty lists while gentlemen like Col. Deeds and others were testing the qualities of the Liberty motor, erecting plants, buying land, experimenting, and doing all sorts of things with our $640,000,000. The Hughes report, prepared at the instance of the President, who had appointed Justice Hughes when a great scandal was brewing with regard to the expenditure of this $640,000,000, suggested that Col. Deeds be court-martialed.

I referred to that the other day and also called attention to the report of the Attorney General, to whom the Hughes report had been referred, and said what was the fact, that the Attorney General, who is about to resign his office, backed up the Hughes report as to Col. Deeds and recommended his court-martial by the War Department. So that we had these representatives of the United States insisting that Col. Deeds be court-martialed for his participation in the use of that $640,000,000. That put it up to the War Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to say that we had no battle planes or aeroplanes in France?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was the report of the Senate committee that we had not one single fighting plane in France as the result of our expenditure of this $640,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What was the date of that report?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That report was made by the Senate committee, headed by Senator THOMAS. Of course, I mean American-made fighting planes, or what the committee called "planes of attack." We had bought planes from France and England, and we are paying for them in the contracts that we validated the other day; but we did not have one single American-made fighting plane in France, according to this Senate report, although we had expended $640,000,000. I quoted from the report of January 8.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then, there must be a later report, showing that we had aeroplanes there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is an economical Government, and we are saving money now by abolishing Subtreasuries and things of that kind. I may have done Col. Deeds an injustice in calling attention to this matter and I may have done the War Department an injustice in referring to these reports, made at the instance of the President of the United States, who is now in France, but Mr. Justice Hughes and the Attorney General, now about to retire, certainly recommended that the derelictions, or at least, the improprieties, of Col. Deeds were such as to warrant his court-martial. We had appropriated the money and he had helped to spend it, and we had no American-made fighting planes in France, and these official appointees of the President insisted that Col. Deeds be court-martialed. The whole matter was referred to the Secretary of War, who now comes to us for more money for clerks to help out——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think I ought to complete this statement in justice to the War Department, for I have undertaken to defend this appropriation of $4,000,000 to help the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General, who is sponsor for sending a great many young fellows to jail for 25 years for going home to see their mothers or something of that kind. The Judge Advocate General may need more clerks to help out, especially when men inclined to "pernicious activity," like Justice Hughes and the Attorney General, insist that some representative or agent or favorite of the Secretary of War be court-martialed. The very idea of Justice Hughes, at the instance of President Wilson, having the impertinence to bring in a report suggesting that one little colonel be court-martialed invites support for additional clerk hire in the Judge Advocate General's office. Why, when these reports went in and this court-martial was demanded, instead of the Secretary of War or the Judge Advocate General, who is the law officer down there, taking Col. Deeds by the neck, what did they do? For one thing, they or somebody else got up a dinner at which Col. Deeds was the chief guest of honor and at which they sang "For he's a jolly good fellow." And although we had spent $640,000,000 and had no American-made fighting planes in France in time for service, Col. Deeds said he did not think the American people, who will have to pay this $640,000,000, understood, as France and England understand, the "spiritual advantages" of the kind of work he had been doing.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Can the gentleman state who got up that dinner?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know who got up the dinner; but Assistant Secretary of War Crowell was there, Gen. Squier was there, and a number of Army officers were there, and they all appear to have been spellbound as Col. Deeds told them of "the spiritual advantages" of spending money the way it had been spent. He seemed to think we did not appreciate the value of the services of men of his kind.

Mr. MADDEN. European officers here refused to go to the dinner, did they not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think some of them were there. But that is not the point. The Judge Advocate General has found Col. Deeds not guilty, and the Secretary of War has just made announcement of that fact, despite the report of Justice Hughes and the views of the Attorney General. So there is to be no court-martial.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, the report of the statistics branch of the General Staff of the Army shows that on November 11, 1918, the United States had manufactured, of the style DH–4 plane, 3,227, of which 1,885 had been shipped overseas. [Applause.] Of the combat Handley-Pages——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was the day the armistice was signed.

Mr. FIELDS. It does not mean that they were all shipped on that day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That does not controvert the statement that I have made.

Mr. FIELDS. This is the report of the number of planes that had been shipped at the time the armistice was signed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. After the war had ended.

Mr. FIELDS. The report shows that we had shipped these planes prior to the signing of the armistice, the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was after the armistice had been signed.

Mr. FIELDS. Of course they were shipped before the armistice was signed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Were they bombing planes or battle planes, so called, or is this one of the reports made by our distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], who kept us all so well informed about the progress of aircraft construction?

Mr. FIELDS. Now, I must proceed with the report. Of the combat Handley-Pages, 101, and 100 had been shipped overseas, making a total shipment overseas of 1,985.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At what date?

Mr. FIELDS. The 11th of November.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was the day the armistice was signed.

Mr. FIELDS. Yes. That covers all shipments made by the department up to that time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Those were training planes, to prepare for the next war.

Mr. FIELDS. Now, taking the engines, of the combat Liberty engine, 13,574 were manufactured, of which 4,383 had been shipped overseas. Of the combat Hispano, we produced 469, and 245 of these were shipped overseas. Of the training, elementary, 10,586 were produced, none of which were shipped overseas. Of the training, advanced, 5,221 were produced, of which 200 had been shipped overseas, making the total shipment overseas of engines 4,828. [Applause.] This does not include 1,025 consigned to the allied governments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. And, in addition to that, we secured 2,676 combat planes, equipped with engines, from all of the allied governments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Were those planes built under the $640,000,000 appropriation or the subsequent appropriation of $800,000,000 which was passed to bolster up the $640,000,000?

Mr. FIELDS. I did not look into that phase of the question, but the figures that are disturbing the gentleman from Pennsylvania probably, and that have disturbed a good many others on that side of the House, are contained here in the fact that we did buy some planes from foreign manufacturers. While that is true, we shipped, as I stated, from this country 1,985 planes and 4,828 engines.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We appropriated another $800,000,000 to accomplish that work.

Mr. FIELDS. And, in addition to that, the balance of the great amount we did manufacture, the figures of which I gave a moment ago, were in service training men in this country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How many of those got up to the fighting line?

Mr. FIELDS. The report does not show that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman state, of his own knowledge or from any report that he has, that a single German aeroplane was destroyed by an American fighting aeroplane?

Mr. FIELDS. I think I can give the gentleman that right here.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, I can state that. I have seen repeated statements in the newspapers, and one very distinguished officer from my home town of Nashville, Tenn.—Capt. Buford—has several to his credit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Was his plane an American machine?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Capt. Buford was serving in the American Aviation Service.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, yes; but was he in an American machine?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I, of course, can not tell that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But that is the question that I asked.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not tell what kind of a machine he was driving, but he was driving a machine as an American soldier, and a splendid one at that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Precisely, and so were many other brave soldiers; but if it is permitted under the rules of the House I will now wager a large red apple with either the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] or the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], the cheer leader on the Democratic side, that they can not prove that one single German plane was ever downed by an American fighter in an American plane.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course the gentleman is safe in making that bet now, if he expects it to be determined now, because I have not the facts.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am asking for the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] whether he expects the House to stay here discussing these matters outside of the bill and then endeavor to keep the House in session until toward midnight to consider the bill itself?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the gentleman that practically all of the talk, with the exception of this speech, that has been made here to-day outside of the bill has come from the gentleman's side of the Chamber.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. Most of the talk has been on the other side of the Chamber. Of course most of it has been useless, but most of it has been on that side.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My memory is not that way.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it was the gentleman's side of the Chamber that precipitated an hour of debate here in which the gentleman agreed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That was a matter in connection with the bill—the question of the Subtreasuries. I was speaking of matter that is not contained in this bill. I think the talk should be confined to the bill, and I have hesitated to make points of order on gentlemen, but if the House is willing I now serve notice that I am going to request gentlemen to confine themselves strictly to the paragraphs under consideration.

Mr. MANN. I asked the gentleman a question. He has not yet answered that, and he indulges in a tirade against this side of the House, which is unjustifiable, and that is whether he expects to keep the committee here to-night?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I expect to ask the committee to stay up into the evening if they will consent to do so because we have made very little progress with this bill, and I hope the gentleman will take that into consideration hereafter so we may make some progress.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I have submitted a request for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was granted.

Mr. FIELDS. The report also shows that the United States planes lost to the enemy number 271; enemy planes lost to the United States, 491, confirmed; and, in addition to that, 354 unconfirmed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Not just now. Which means there were not three persons able to make an affidavit that they knew of their own personal knowledge that these enemy planes were lost to the United States. The report therefore shows that there were 845 enemy planes lost to the United States, confirmed and unconfirmed, as against 271 lost by the United States, which shows a decided gain in favor of the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know whether there were any American-bought planes ever delivered at the battle front?

Mr. FIELDS. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia, Judge HARRISON.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to say there was a statement made before the Committee on War Affairs by the War Council that there were a number of American-made planes manned by American fliers at the front at the time the armistice was signed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a statement? I, myself, was at the American air base in France about the 16th of October. Up to that time about a thousand Liberty motors had been delivered adapted for bombing planes, but up to that time not a single combat plane had been delivered to the American base in France in the middle of October—not a single fighting plane. I was there and found that out myself.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I have only the statement made before the Committee on Military Affairs by the War Council, at which were present the Secretary of War, or his Assistant Secretary of War, and somebody representing——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. A thousand engines had been delivered at the time I was there which were adapted for bombing planes but not for pursuit planes.

Mr. FIELDS. But the main proposition is there were planes there belonging to America, paid for by American money, manned by American men; and there were nearly four times as many enemy planes lost to the United States as there were American planes lost to the enemy.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. That is, out of the $640,000,000 all the planes necessary for the protection of American troops were brought from the French and English manufacturers.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes, as I think I can clear up this situation and stop the discussion.

Mr. BRYNS of Tennessee. I am not going to object to the two minutes, but I shall object to any further extension of time unless the discussion is confined to this bill.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, there is some confusion here in regard to what a fighting plane is. Every plane that carries bombs or any other weapons that goes over the lines into enemy territory to participate in the fighting in any manner is a fighting plane in one sense of the word. We had a number of large planes, called bombing planes, made in America, that got up to the front before the end of the war.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What does the gentleman call a number?

Mr. TILSON. Well, a small number; it will be only a guess, but as there were about 1,800 shipped from this country, my guess would be that about one-third of them reached the war zone, and some of our boys went over the line in our own planes. [Applause.] These were bombing planes, and not pursuit planes or what the French call chasse planes. My opinion is that if there were any German planes brought down by an American-made plane it was because some American bombing plane happened to get above the German plane and dropped a bomb on it. We had no planes of American make there that were suitable or able to contest with the swift-flying planes of Germany. All the planes that our fliers used in bringing down German planes were European-made combat or pursuit planes. The planes of this kind used most by our fliers were the French S. P. A. D. and Nieuport. Possibly some of the British Bristols were used.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In other words, there was never an American ace in an American plane?

Mr. TILSON. Not in an American-made aeroplane. We bought those planes abroad and our men flew them. Our men fought, so far as they fought in the air, in the speedy planes bought from France and Great Britain. This is where the confusion arises. There were American-made planes, but there were no pursuit planes, those planes with which one flier would go after another and bring him down with machine-gun fire.

Mr. HEFLIN. Those planes were bought and paid for out of American money.

Mr. TILSON. Yes. Not out of the $640,000,000, necessarily. Most of that sum was spent in this country in the attempt to develop the Liberty engine and the planes made in this country. A large amount, something over a billion, all told, in addition to the original $640,000,000, was spent in this country and abroad in connection with airplanes. The $640,000,000 that we first appropriated was largely expended in this country in trying to find out what engine and planes to build. These are the facts, so far as they go, which I believe can not be successfully challenged.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Adjutant General's Office: Chief clerk, $2,500; 10 chiefs of divisions, at $2,000 each; clerks—58 of class 4, 74 of class 3, 116 of class 2, 231 of class 1, 93 at $1,000 each; engineer, $1,400; assistant engineer, $900; 2 firemen; skilled mechanic, $1,000; 11 messengers; 61 assistant messengers; 4 watchmen; 21 laborers; in all, $852,540; all employees provided for by this paragraph for The Adjutant General's Office of the War Department shall be exclusively engaged on the work of this office for the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee where he provides the sum for the temporary employees in the War Department located in Washington?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is on page 68 of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, how much of this does it amount to?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Four million dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. That covers all employees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That covers all the temporary employees.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I want to know.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course the bill carries an appropriation for all the statutory, regular, permanent force.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that. I was just wondering whether they were reducing the number of employees or not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are considerably reducing them. As explained before, they had a regular appropriation of $10,250,000, in round numbers. They are back now asking for a deficiency of something like $6,000,000, which, if allowed, would mean the expenditure of over $16,000,000 this fiscal year for these temporary employees. This recommendation is for only $4,000,000 during the next fiscal year. I will say to the gentleman I do not know whether it is going to be sufficient or not. Gen. Lord, who, by the way, is one of the most competent gentlemen I have ever listened to in a hearing, and who served as secretary to the Dingley Ways and Means Committee years ago, submitted this estimate. He does not think $4,000,000 is enough.

Mr. MADDEN. We had about 98,000 employees here due to the war; sixty thousand and odd employees more than we had during the time of peace. The understanding was that these additional people were going to be dismissed rather rapidly, but the last report I saw, two or three days ago, indicates that only 2,500 people have been dismissed so far; that is, the force has been reduced only 2,500. Now, does not the gentleman think that is rather slow?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know. I admit very frankly it is not near so many as I had expected would have been released by this time. I had hoped they would make a greater reduction.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I hope they will get into action and dispense with the unnecessary employees. I think it may be fairly said that you can go into any department of the Government at any hour of any day and can walk through from end to end and you will not find more than one person out of every hundred doing anything. And it seems to me that if there is no work for them to do they ought not to be kept on the pay roll. And I think notice should be served on the executive branches of the Government that we expect them to reduce the forces that were called here on account of the war, and that 2,500 dismissals or resignations since the signing of the armistice is not anything like the proportion of extra employees on the pay roll that ought to have been dispensed with.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. May I ask the gentleman a question about these extra employees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Are the young men who were at work in the departments here and when the war came on were given commissions as lieutenants and captains and what not, and continued in the departments, carried in this bill, or provision for them carried in this bill, or are they paid out of the military appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are paid for out of the pay for the Army, carried in the military appropriation bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Then this $4,000,000 does not refer to them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. This applies to civilian employees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Surgeon General: Chief clerk, $2,250; principal assistant librarian, $2,250; principal clerk, $2,000; chemist, $2,100; assistant chemist, $1,600; pathologist, $1,800; microscopist, $1,800; assistant librarian, $1,800; anatomist, $1,600; entomologist, $1,600; photographer, $1,500; 2 translators, at $1,800 each; clerks—14 of class 4, 13 of class 3, 26 of class 2, 36 of class 1, 13 at $1,000 each, 2 at $900 each; engineer, $1,400; skilled mechanic, $1,000; 2 messengers; 11 assistant messengers; 3 firemen; 3 watchmen; superintendent of building (Army Medical Museum and Library), $200; 6 laborers; 4 charwomen; in all, $185,740.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was much surprised to receive a letter from the War Department that was not a form letter. I have a communication from the Surgeon General giving information to the House in reference to discharges from the Medical Corps that I would like to have read. It is a very courteous and informing letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, January 15, 1919.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MANN: I am very glad, through the opportunity given in your letter of January 11, to explain to you the difficulties the Medical Department is having in the demobilization of the Army on account of the very great number of requests for the release from service of personnel now attached to the department.

Just as soon as the armistice was signed the Medical Department laid out a plan of demobilization, which it has carried out in a perfectly consistent manner. The problems before the department are most difficult to handle and hard to explain to those not familiar with the facts.

While the troops in the United States are being demobilized as rapidly as possible, the sick are being returned from France in great numbers; 44,000 have been returned altogether and 33,000 of this number have been returned since the armistice was signed. Over 23,000 were returned in December, and we are informed that the December rate will be continued for at least the next three months. From that time on only sick and wounded will be returned incident to the command which may be held in France. To meet the obligations of the Medical Department to care for the sick it is absolutely necessary for us to keep in service a sufficient personnel to man our hospitals. It is also necessary for us to keep certain surplus officers for special service, for they will certainly be required before the sick and wounded are cared for, and if the necessary provision is not made in advance the department will surely be criticized for not giving the soldier the treatment to which he is entitled and which the people have a right to demand. Under the circumstances enumerated above it is perfectly possible for an officer to say that he is not busy at present and to believe his services can be dispensed with, but his retention in the service is for good and sufficient reasons, which I am sure you will approve.

I think you ought to know that since the armistice was signed the Medical Department has discharged and returned to civil life 9,336 officers. Of this number 7,350 were medical officers, 1,124 dental surgeons, 383 veterinary surgeons, and 477 Sanitary Corps officers; 2,500 members of the Army Nurse Corps have also been discharged and returned to their occupations in civil life.

With these statements, I sincerely trust the Medical Department will be held in your mind as having laid out a sane and sensible plan of demobilization.

I desire to assure you that letters such as you have written to the department will never be used to the injury of the officer involved.

With cordial regards,
Very sincerely, yours,
M. W. IRELAND,
Surgeon General United States Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the spelling of the word "Museum," page 71, line 12. In the bill as printed it is spelled "Musuem."

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish to add just a word to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said with reference to the courtesy with which Members are treated by the Surgeon General and the personnel of his office. I think the universal testimony would be from the Members of the House that we have had no occasion to complain of any lack of courtesy there; and not only that, but the information which they have received was of the character which has just been described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], informing, instructive, and useful. That does not mean that Members always were able to obtain what they desired. On the contrary, they have often come away without obtaining it, but they have always been furnished with good reasons why the order could not be made. And this has extended, I think, clear down through the Surgeon General's Department, with some occasional lapses perhaps, owing to the fact that in so large an organization it would be impossible for perfect service to be rendered everywhere.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that the Surgeon General's office, in connection with the demobilization, made an order a while ago that men in the service over 50 years of age should be released. Apparently the theory on which that order was issued was that men over 50 would have more difficulty in reestablishing themselves in their practice at home than the younger men. Just exactly the opposite was true, I think. One or two cases came under my notice of men over 50 who wanted to stay in the service, but were not allowed to stay. They were rather enjoying the varied experience and new life they were leading in the service, and wanted to stay a while longer. But they were all let out. There, it seems to me, is one place where the Surgeon General's office rather overreached itself by acting on the wrong theory.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will have to confess that when the Surgeon General's office made that order I thought it was an excellent one, founded on very substantial reasons. It may not have worked out perfectly in all cases. I think that is true with respect to most orders. Indeed, no order could be expected to work out perfectly in all cases.

Mr. PLATT. There may be cases where men over 50 did not want to stay, but if so, those were exceptional. I think they could reestablish themselves more easily in their home towns than could younger men, who had not got their practice so well together.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public buildings and grounds.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. May I ask the chairman of the committee a question, in reference to the item of War Department expenses on page 72, that I overlooked? It is at the top of page 72, covering expenditures in the drafting department. It says that the amount shall not exceed $400,000. Can the gentleman tell us what the expenditures of this department were ordinarily in peace times, before the war? I was under the impression that it was not to exceed half of this, and I was in hope we would get somewhat nearer back to a peace basis with reference to such matters.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In 1917 the authorization was $140,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Of course, that was in war times.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That was the year beginning July 1, 1916, and extending up to July 1, 1917.

Mr. STAFFORD. We were not in the war in 1916.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. One hundred and forty thousand dollars was the amount of the authorization.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is right. That was an oversight of mine. This appropriation, of course, was made before the declaration of war, and was not made in view of the war. That escaped me for the moment.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to ask a question of the chairman about the Militia Bureau. There seems to be the usual large appropriation for this bureau, which I had supposed to be now practically out of business. While the National Guard, formerly under the bureau, is all in the service and not under the bureau at all, what is the situation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There have been a good many companies raised in the various States which have not participated in the war.

Mr. TILSON. There are only eight States in the Union that have any organizations of the National Guard left.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think my State is one of them.

Mr. TILSON. Yes. The gentleman's State is one of them; but I repeat, that there are only eight States in the Union that have a remnant of the National Guard left.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is expected by the Chief of Militia Affairs that there will be an increase in the National Guard in the various States.

Mr. TILSON. That is just the interesting point that I wished to bring out, the anticipations of the powers that be as to the activities that will take place under this bureau in the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy Department Annex, near New York Avenue near Seventeenth Street NW.: Engineer, $1,200; 6 firemen; 5 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 7 watchmen; skilled laborer, $840; 7 laborers; attendant, $480; in all, $20,100.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on page 76, line 15, after the word "annex," appears the word "near." That word has no business there, and I move that it be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee:

Page 76, line 15, after the word "annex," strike out the word "near."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval Observatory: Astronomer, $2,800; assistant astronomers—1 $2,400, 1 $2,000, 1 $1,800; assistant in department of nautical instruments, $1,600; clerks—1 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 2 of class 1; instrument maker, $1,500; electrician, $1,500; librarian, $1,800; assistants—3 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each; stenographer and typewriter, $900; foreman and captain of the watch, $1,000; carpenter, $1,000; engineer, $1,200; 3 firemen; 6 watchmen; mechanic, $900; 9 laborers; in all, $52,820.

For miscellaneous computations, $5,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I notice that about $100,000 is appropriated for the Naval Observatory, including the Nautical Almanac Office. Does the gentleman know what amount was appropriated last year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think it was about the same amount. I do not think there has been any increase. I will give the gentleman the exact figures.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That is sufficient—about the same amount?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Several years ago there was a very interesting hearing before the gentleman's committee on the subject of the Naval Observatory. I think letters and statements were presented to the committee from the most noted astronomers throughout the country, as I recall, from all of the professors of astronomy in the various leading educational institutions in the ccuntry, all of them insisting that this bureau should be taken from under the Navy Department, and the fact was cited that more money is spent in maintaining this Naval Observatory than is expended on any other naval observatory in all the world, and that the observations of the astronomers, the scientific work of the astronomical observatory, aside from the mere timing, repairing, etc., of chronometers, had resulted in very little if any contribution to astronomical knowledge. A year ago I called attention to it again, and assuming that that would call the attention of the officials of the Naval Observatory to the fact, I read into the RECORD many of those same criticisms. After the first hearing no statement from the Naval Observatory or from the naval authorities was incorporated in the hearings to contradict or controvert either the statements or the positions taken by these scientific gentlemen. So far as I have been able to learn the Navy Department said nothing. I was wondering if this year the naval authorities undertook to give any justification or defense, or attempted to controvert the opinions that had been incorporated in the RECORD, from these scientific men throughout the country, all to the effect that this observatory ought to be taken out from under the Navy Department and placed under the Smithsonian Institution, in order that science might get the benefit of this very large expenditure of money.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the subject was not referred to in the hearings this year. I recall the statement made by the gentleman a year ago when this bill was under consideration. The hearings to which the gentleman has referred were had some years ago, I think, and I am not familiar with them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. They were held some years ago; and last year I again called the attention of the committee and of the Navy Department, and of such others as might chance to read the record, to the subject by reincorporating some of these statements, hoping that perhaps the Navy Department would give some reason why the observatory should be retained under that department.

Mr. GARNER. The way to attract their attention is to move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I would not move to do that. I do not think it ought to be stricken out, though I did introduce a bill to have the observatory transferred to the Smithsonian Institution, where it belongs.

Mr. GARNER. I was not suggesting to the gentleman that he move to strike it out for any other purpose than to attract their attention. In that way I am sure he would attract the attention of those who are going to get the pay.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I introduced a bill to have it transferred to the Smithsonian; but, of course, under the rules of the House that bill was referred to the Naval Affairs Committee; and thereby hangs a tale.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman understands that this Naval Observatory is engaged in timing, testing, and repairing chronometers?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I understand that there are two small stations, one at Mare Island, Cal., and the other one in Washington. The one in Washington ought to be on the seacoast, because after they have adjusted these very delicate instruments they must be put on board a train and transported to a seaport in order to be placed on vessels. But that is a very small part of the expense of maintaining this observatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigation of rural education, industrial education, physical education, and school hygiene, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and no salary shall be paid hereunder in excess of $3,500 per annum, $50,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think there is an amendment pending to this paragraph, offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] earlier in the day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] by unanimous consent offered the amendment, which was to be considered pending at this point. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS: Page 101, substitute for the paragraph, lines 1 to 5, inclusive, the following:

"For investigation and promotion of rural education, industrial education, physical education, and school hygiene, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $61,300: Provided, That the increase ($11,300) shall be expended for physical education and school hygiene over and above the amount of the current appropriation used for that purpose: And provided further, That not less than $6,000 of this additional appropriation shall be used for personal services and expenses outside of the District of Columbia, $61,300.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment, becaue it provides for activities not authorized by existing law.

For many years past the head of the Bureau of Education has been seeking to have the language changed so as to provide for the promotion of various activities. That would confer upon him official authority for work which he is not now authorized to perform.

I direct the attention of the Chairman to the fact that under existing law the phraseology is as carried in the bill, for investigation of rural education, industrial education, physical education. I have reserved the point of order on the paragraph as carried by the bill also, but there is no authorization whatsoever for promotion purposes. That is something outside of and distinct from any activity that the commissioner has heretofore performed.

The CHAIRMAN. The provision carried in the appropriation bill for the current fiscal year is for investigation of rural education, industrial education, school hygiene, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere. The Chair understands that the purposes for which the appropriation is carried in the appropriation for the current fiscal year are authoized by law.

Mr. STAFFORD. The item under consideration, if the Chair would permit, provides for investigational work, and it does not authorize promotional work. The chief of the bureau has been seeking for years to obtain authorization to provide for promotion, whereby he may be able to expend money in other lines than investigational work. The committee has not authorized that character of work, and the amendment now submitted carries that authorization. I make the point of order for that reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order on the paragraph in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigation of kindergarten education, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $6,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $2,500 per annum.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 102, after line 13, insert the following new paragraph:

"For promoting the work of the home education division, $13,500."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] whether the Bureau of Education did not estimate for an appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; they submitted an estimate of $13,500.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The estimate was submitted by the Commissioner of Education?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there are a number of good women in this country who are interested in this work, and they have been cheerfully cooperating with the Commissioner of Education for a number of years, I think since 1913, in the distribution of helpful literature to mothers of the country, and particularly in the matter of home reorganization work. They have been laboring amongst the foreign born and with the less erudite of our American population, believing that it was necessary to aid the mothers of the land who may not otherwise be given that assistance in the care of children that would make for good citizenship. I have been impressed by the stories of the accomplishment of the Bureau of Education, cooperating with these volunteers. I think the work has been inspired very largely by what is known as the Mothers' Congress, an organization of women who meet annually and who have been dedicating their services to mothers through the instrumentality of the organization over which the Commissioner of Education presides. They have been distributing literature, especially with respect to child-welfare work and the care of babies. They have been doing what they could to place in the hands of mothers material for making the home better and for developing children.

They have issued pamphlets and delivered addresses in the matter of home study for boys and girls. They have done what they could to help bring children up right, and have given instruction in respect to the care of the homestead and matters particularly interesting to new settlers, who are at a loss for literature and information with regard to home economics. They have had home courses for the study of children, have distributed books suitable to children, and have aided them in their common-school courses.

My understanding was that the chairman of the subcommittee on appropriations was inclined to look with favor upon this proposition, more especially as these ladies during the first year of their activities, cooperating with the Commissioner of Education, were of direct aid to as many as 10,500 mothers in the United States who had children under 3 years of age, and many more each year since. In view of the voluntary services of these ladies, some of whom have been on the roll at a dollar a year to obtain a status to make their work more effective, I had hoped the point of order would not be pressed. The appropriation called for in the amendment is the amount recommended by the Commissioner of Education for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the gentleman's contention that this is authorized by law?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; it is new matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it was not my privilege to be present when the bill was marked up providing for the various appropriations for the Bureau of Education. Undoubtedly the Members who were then present had very good reason for not approving of the recommendation. Therefore I feel constrained to make the point of order, because it is a new activity.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, by permission of the committee, I append herewith certain data with regard to this work:

ACTIVITIES AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE HOME EDUCATION DIVISION, SEPTEMBER 15, 1913–MAY 15, 1918.

ORGANIZATION.

During the 56 months of its existence there have been employed 1 secretary continuously at work, 6 stenographers at different periods, and 8 clerks temporarily, besides 2 volunteer workers.

The division has had 42 months of stenographic and 30 months of clerks' service. It was without stenographic service 10 months. The Bureau of Education furnished stenographic service 1½ months.

During this period the stenographer was shared with the office of the National Congress of Mothers for 9 months, at which time 428 dictated letters were written for that office and some addressing of envelopes.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The following statement gives number of letters received and the number of dictated and form letters sent. A large number of book summaries are received daily, read, and acknowledged. Much correspondence is required in connection with these. This does not appear on this report. It requires most of the time of 1 clerk to read and send material requested daily.

CHILD-WELFARE WORK.

Of first importance is the effort to place in the hands of mothers material on the care and training of their children, especially the babies. The work began by securing names of cooperators from county superintendents. In 1913 there were sent in the names of 24,000 women; of these, 16,000, or 68 per cent of these women expressed themselves as willing to cooperate. Upon first request, 949 county superintendents responded with lists. At that time there were 2,700 county superintendents; 35 per cent answered. The second year 510 responded to a second request.

During the first year 10,500 mothers of children under 3 years of age received the bulletin on Care of the Baby.

During the first year the following requests were made:

Bulletins on home matters.
Literature for a population of Swedes, Cornish, German, Dutch, and Irish.
Material to better the home.
On home making and child nurture.
Home study for boys and girls.
Something to help them bring their children up right.
Literature on moral training.
Care of stock and homestead matters.
Care of sick.
Home courses of study for children.
Books suitable to children who have completed common-school course.
Literature on the beautifying of school inside and out.
Helps for bringing together the home and school.
Reading matter on plays and games.
Literature on care and training of children.

HOME EDUCATION TOURS.

During the 1916 itinerary, three tours were made and meetings arranged by the division and three special collaborators visited one or more of the following cities: Leesburg, Fredericksburg, Danville, Bristol, and Abingdon, Va.; Asheville, Lincolnton, Wadesboro, and Greensboro, N. C.; Rock Hill, Florence, Columbia, Lancaster, and Charleston, S. C.; Augusta, Savannah, Atlanta, Macon, Milledgeville, Dallas, Marietta, and Fairy, Ga.; Tallahassee, Tampa, Miami, Eustis, Tavares, Avon Park, Clearwater, Clermont, St. Petersburg, Haines City, Montvarde, Fort Pierce, and West Palm Beach, Fla.; Montgomery and Birmingham, Ala.; Columbus, Miss.; Chattanooga and Nashville, Tenn.

READING COURSES.

Ten reading courses have been issued. There is an enrollment of over 7,000 readers. One hundred and fifty-six have finished one or more courses and received the certificate. Several reprints of all the courses have been made. In the Cleveland High School 144 boys and girls have recently enrolled in the miscellaneous courses for boys and girls.

Reading circles have been formed and are alive, the most active of these is the Parents' Reading Circle, in Glendale, Cal.

Complete sets of reading courses have been sent to all libraries in the United States. Courses 1 and 2 were sent to all high schools.

In preparing these courses the following committees assisted: Courses 1, 2, 6, and 8, Prof. W. L. Phelps, Prof. C. Alphonso Smith, Prof. Charles F. Smith, and Prof. Richard Burton; course 10, Prof. W. H. Mace and Drs. Wilbur F. Gordy, Franklin L. Riley, and William Starr Myers; courses 7 and 9, Miss Mary R. Parkman.

Preparation of test questions has been by one or more of these assistants, with the addition of Miss Lucy Wheelock and Miss Mabel Thomas.

QUESTIONNAIRES AND ADDRESSOGRAPH LIST OF PARENT-TEACHER ASSOCIATIONS.

Ten questionnaires have been sent out, largely in the effort to get lists of organizations. This has been difficult. An addressograph list of associations has been made, including about 4,000.

Through cooperation of National Council of Defense another effort is being made to get complete lists of organizations.

PUBLICITY GIVEN TO THE WORK AND READING COURSES.

Through the bureau's agency, through periodicals, newspapers, State and local librarians, high schools and teachers.

COOPERATION OF STATE AND LOCAL LIBRARIES.

All States having State or traveling libraries have cooperated to the fullest extent by arrangement with the division to furnish books to readers when necessary. Every library in the United States has received sets of all the reading courses.

ACTIVITIES OF DIVISION NOT ALREADY MENTIONED.

Preparation of charts for Pan-Pacific Exposition, monthly reports submitted to the commissioner and Mrs. Schoff, annual statements, home-education chapter in report of commissioner each year.

The Clerk read as follows:

For judges of circuit courts, at $4,000 each, so much as may be necessary, for the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire in reference to the judges of the circuit court of Hawaii why there is no number designated? It says, "at $4,000 each, so much as may be necessary for the fiscal year 1920." It seems to me to be a very indefinite item. I recall on visiting the islands some year and a half ago meeting a very large number of very agreeable gentlemen who were judges. I was wondering whether the number was unlimited who can be designated to serve in the Island of Hawaii.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are limited in number by law, but there is no specific amount named here by way of appropriation. I understand that those judges where they are holding court away from their usual place of residence are entitled possibly to some per diem in lieu of subsistence and traveling expenses and that, of course, is an indefinite amount, depending upon the length of the term of the court, and so forth.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not see if, as the gentleman says, the number is specified by law, why it would not be perfectly feasible to state in the item here what the appropriation is to be. This is a very indefinite item, and there is nothing similar to it in the bill, as far as I have seen.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am frank to say to the gentleman that I can not tell him why the number has never been designated. All I can say is that they never have been named as to number in the appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, is not the explanation to be found in the fact that the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii has authority to determine the number of these circuit judges, and if the legislature provides an additional number, of course that burden is thrown upon our Government and has to be paid?

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether or not these judges are not Federal judges and nominated and chosen from here? In other words, the item at the bottom of page 107 designates that there shall be a chief justice, two associate justices, in all, $28,000. That is a perfectly correct item. Then the next item reads:

For judges of circuit courts, at $4,000 each, so much as may be necessary, for the fiscal year 1920.

Now, is not there some provision of law under which the number of these circuit judges is specified? They are certainly appointed from this country, because I met gentlemen from various sections of this country there serving as judges—ex-Members of Congress and others.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the gentleman mean those designated in the paragraph at the bottom of page 107—chief justice and two associate justices? Did he mean them?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think I did.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not certain, but are they nominated by the President?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think it will be found they are nominated from this country and are residents of this country and sent to Hawaii to serve, and therefore it seems to me perfectly proper, if that statement is correct, that the number should be designated in the bill and the item carried as a specific amount.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are named by the President and they are required to have had a certain amount of residence in Hawaii before they are eligible for appointment.

Mr. TREADWAY. I beg to differ with the gentleman on that score, because I was there and had the pleasure of meeting some of them who had recently come from the mainland.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I happen to know there was a gentleman there, a resident of Hawaii, who held one position——

Mr. TREADWAY. That is true; but others came from here.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know an assistant district attorney was appointed from this country and sent from here, and subsequently there was a vacancy in the position of circuit judge, and he became an applicant, and the question arose as to whether or not he had been there a sufficient length of time, and whether he had really taken up his permanent residence there during the time he had served as assistant district attorney.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the uncertainty, does not the chairman think it is proper to pass this item over and make further inquiry of the department to see whether or not a specific amount can not be carried in the bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am perfectly willing to pass it over in order to get the facts.

Mr. TREADWAY. It seems to me we ought to have a little more information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois could furnish light on the subject.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know the reason why the number should not be specified if anybody knows the number of the circuit judges. I think about the only place we carry the provision "so much as may be necessary," as the amount is entirely uncertain, is we make an appropriation for the retired Federal judges in that language, "so much as may be necessary." The law fixes the pay but does not fix the number, and, as they are rather elderly gentlemen to the young men of the House, and some of them pass away during the year, it has never been the custom to fix a specific amount of appropriation. How this came about originally, as to this particular item to which the gentleman from Massachusetts referred, I do not know, but I assume there was some question as to the number of judges who would be paid out there, and, as the law fixes the pay and, I think, now fixes the number of judges, it ought to be an easy matter to ascertain the amount, and, whichever way the appropriation is made, the amount that will be paid out will be the same.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the suggestion of the chairman of the committee is advisable, that the matter be passed over for further information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office Postmaster General: Postmaster General, $12,000; chief clerk, including $500 as superintendent of buildings, $4,000; private secretary, $2,500; disbursing clerk, $2,250; appointment clerk, assistant to chief clerk, confidential clerk to Postmaster General, and chairman board of inspection, at $2,000 each; chief inspector, $4,000; chief clerk to chief inspector, $2,000; purchasing agent, $4,000; chief clerk to purchasing agent, $2,000; assistant attorneys—1 $2,750, 1 $2,500; 3 at $2,000 each; bond examiner, $2,500; law clerk, $1,800; clerks—110 of class 4, 166 of class 3, 259 of class 2, 297 of class 1, 138 at $1,000 each, 26 at $900 each; skilled draftsmen—1 $2,000, 3 at $1,800 each, 8 at $1,600 each, five at $1,400 each, 7 at $1,200 each; map mounter, $1,200; assistant map mounter, $1,000; blue printer, $900; assistant blue printer, $840; telegrapher, $1,400; typewriter repairer, $1,200; 3 telephone switchboard operators; 2 messengers in charge of mails, at $900 each; 29 messengers; 32 assistant messengers; captain of the watch, $1,200; additional to 3 watchmen acting as lieutenants of watchmen, at $120 each; 34 watchmen; 2 engineers, at $1,200 each; 9 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; 2 blacksmiths or steam fitters, at $1,000 each; 3 oilers, at $840 each; 15 firemen; 20 elevator conductors, at $720 each; chief engineer, $1,600; assistant electricians—2 at $1,200 each, 3 at $1,000 each; 2 dynamo tenders, at $900 each; carpenters—1 $1,400, 3 at $1,000 each; awning maker, painter, and plumber, at $1,000 each; assistant plumber, $900; laborers—foreman $900, assistant foreman $840, 2 at $840 each, 76 at $720 each, 4 at $660 each; female laborers—1 $540, 3 at $500 each, 8 at $480 each; 58 charwomen; actual and necessary expenses of the purchasing agent while traveling on business of the department, $500; in all, $1,659,140.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the need of the increase in the number of clerks here in the early part of this paragraph?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That represents an increase, I think, of about $30,000.

Mr. WALSH. It is quite an increase in the number of clerks, I take it, in one or two of the items.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Increased work has fallen on that department.

Mr. WALSH. Is that department here in Washington?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is that due to taking over the cables or telegraphs?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has no relation to the cables. But there has been a great increase in the work of the department here. As a matter of fact, there may be some question as to whether or not the department was really justified in having reduced the number of its employees so largely heretofore. But owing to the activities of the war and other reasons the work of the department has increased, in the Dead Letter Office, for one thing.

Mr. WALSH. That is on account of the return of letters from abroad?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And then in the work incident to thrift stamps and other activities.

Mr. WALSH. That is the reason for giving them extra clerks now——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Extra clerks.

Mr. WALSH (continuing). That possibly it was not good judgment to have dispensed with heretofore?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think it is entirely possible that they were not altogether wise in reducing their clerical force to the extent it has been reduced. Of course, the gentleman will understand they have reduced the expenses of this department for clerical services something over $200,000, if my memory serves me correctly, and this only restores a small portion of the clerks that have been dropped heretofore.

Mr. WALSH. To the detriment of the service.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what is the duty of the captain of the watch, and lieutenants, and 34 watchmen? Where are they placed and what are they doing?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are here in the Post Office Department Building, on Pennsylvania Avenue, and also in this general supply depot. I take it that some of them are located there, but largely they are in the main department building on Pennsylvania Avenue. They serve in three shifts.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman thinks that 34 of them are not too many?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; they are not. The gentleman will understand that these watchmen serve in three shifts, a watchman on duty all the time during the 24 hours, and it is necessary to maintain three shifts for that purpose.

Mr. JUUL. That is what I wanted to know.

The Clerk read as follows:

For publication of copies of the Official Postal Guide, $33,000; and the amounts received during the fiscal year 1920 from sales of the Official Postal Guide to the public may be used as a further appropriation for the publication of copies of such guide.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. STEENERSON rose.

Mr. STEENERSON. I was not going to inquire about that paragraph, but about the next one.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee as to why the Official Postal Guide is published in other than the Government Printing Office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps I might be able to give the gentleman the information by reason of my service on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. For years the Official Postal Guide was printed under contract by a printer at Albany, N. Y.—Lyon by name, I believe. The Government had a very favorable contract with the printer, but the printer recouped himself for the very low price at which he furnished the guides for the use of the Government by the high price he charged the public. So the Postmaster General two or three years ago came before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and asked that he be privileged to sell these guides to the public. As a result the public, instead of paying two or three dollars for the guides, are now receiving them for a much less amount—a little more than a dollar, I think. It is a relic of the old system of letting contracts for printing to outside agencies.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know whether or not the Government Printing Office is equipped to publish this guide?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question whatsoever that the Government Printing Office has the machinery to print it, but it is something more than that. The publisher, as I understand it, compiles the various data and also publishes throughout the year a monthly supplement, which at the end of the year is compiled into the next yearly Official Guide.

Mr. WALSH. I understood so. The inquiry I made was as to why it was published by an outside firm, a private establishment, instead of being published in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Just like the Gulf Stream. It got started that way and kept on going, and nothing has ever interfered to check the practice, so far as legislation is concerned.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know from his experience whether the Government is paying more than it would cost to publish this in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would say the Government is paying much less, according to the testimony, as I recall it, of the Postmaster General before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads—much less.

Mr. WALSH. If is having published by outside publishers a public document which is costing the Government less than if it were printed in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the testimony before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads when this question was under consideration some years ago, when this new method of disposition to the public was decided upon.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know how many of these guides are available for free distribution under this arrangement?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Post Office Department receives so many copies, which are distributed one to every postmaster in the country, and also copies for distribution to the executive departments and their various agencies. But there are none, as I recall, for free distribution to the public. They are on sale to the public at the price of a little over a dollar.

Mr. WALSH. I want to thank the gentleman for the information.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For reimbursement of the Government Printing Office for the cost of furnishing steam for heating and electric current for lighting and power to the Post Office Department Building at Massachusetts Avenue and North Capitol Street, District of Columbia, $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. I want to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill why that item is in this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For this reason, I will say to the gentleman: The Government Printing Office has been furnishing the heat and light to the city post office up here near the Union Station, and no charge has been made on the Post Office Department for the expense so incurred. The Government Printing Office now insists that they ought to have some pay for this extra expense, and it is estimated to be about $40,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. But the post office of the city of Washington is a part of the Postal Service just as much as is the post office in Chicago, and the expense of lighting that post office is a part of the expense of the Postal Service generally. It is not a departmental expense. As I understand it, it is just as chargeable to the postal revenues as the expense of heating post offices in any other city, and therefore it ought to be appropriated for by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman maintain that the cost of maintenance, heating, and lighting of our Government buildings throughout the country is chargeable and paid out of the postal revenues of the Government?

Mr. STEENERSON. I believe it is as to most of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. STEENERSON. We make an appropriation for the small offices, I know.

Mr. STAFFORD. We do not provide for the heating and lighting of any Government-owned building out of the postal revenues, but we do make an appropriation, such as I believe the gentleman from Minnesota refers to, for heating and lighting the smaller offices of the country, where they are in rented quarters.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is mistaken that they do not include some Government buildings, because that appropriation for rent and fuel and light is applicable to the second and third class post offices.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; where the offices are not in Government buildings, because, as the gentleman will find when he investigates, that item of appropriation is an allowance to the postmaster. It is not based at all on audited bills as to the amount of expenditures for light and heat. In fact, that appropriation, as the gentleman will recall, limits the amount that can be paid to any post office of the smaller class.

Now, the fact is, Mr. Chairman, the maintenance, heat, and light of all our Government-owned buildings is carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill. Here in the District of Columbia, where we had a joint post-office building and a department building, like the one that is down on Pennsylvania Avenue, the upkeep of that building is carried in this legislative appropriation bill, because it is a departmental building. So far as the new city post office is concerned, to which this item refers, it is not only a building for field purposes but also for departmental activities. It is a building used for combined field activity and departmental activity. But regardless of whether or not it is exclusively used for departmental purposes or for purposes of a field character, nevertheless the pay for the upkeep would have to come from the appropriations reported from the Committee on Appropriations. They are carried either in the sundry civil bill or in the legislative bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. The point I make is that it does not belong in this legislative bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am very glad to have the gentleman's later thought, but it does belong in this bill. It is rather late for the gentleman to make a point of order at this stage.

Mr. STEENERSON. I said I reserved a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is as pertinent to be carried in this bill as is the appropriation providing for the upkeep, maintenance, and heating and lighting of the Post Office Building on Pennsylvania Avenue, inasmuch as it is used for both postal and departmental purposes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would say to the gentleman that it is my understanding that this is the city post office, and the department building is located down on Pennsylvania Avenue. I was unaware, until the gentleman from Wisconsin enlightened me, that this new building that was built for use as a city post office was used in any degree for departmental post-office purposes. I am surprised to hear that it is used in part for departmental purposes. I have not been down there for some time, and I did not know it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are some divisions of the Railway Mail Service that are housed there which were formerly housed in the building on Pennsylvania Avenue.

Mr. STEENERSON. I formally stated I had reserved a point of order. Is that correct, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman reserved a point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I simply wanted the information that the gentleman from Wisconsin has so generously contributed; and it seems to me, notwithstanding that information, the item ought not to be in this bill. We can not understand what the expense of keeping up our public buildings is when that expense is scattered in all these bills.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Suppose the gentleman is correct. I do not concede that for a moment. But suppose the gentleman is correct and we do not make this appropriation here and the Government Printing Office should stop furnishing heat and light to the city post-office building, what would happen?

Mr. STEENERSON. That would be a very cold and dark situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. We would have to use matches, as we did here the other night, and adjourn and stop business when the lights went out.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not care anything about it, but I do not think it is properly in this bill. I do not think it ought to be here.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of Commerce, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; assistant to the Secretary, $2,750; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; confidential clerk to the Secretary, $1,800; private secretary to Assistant Secretary, $2,100; chief clerk and superintendent, $3,000; disbursing clerk, $3,000; chiefs of divisions—appointments $2,500, publications $2,500, supplies $2,100; assistant chief, division of publications, $2,000; clerks—10 of class 4, 9 of class 3, 13 of class 2, 20 of class 1, 14 at $1,000 each, 13 at $900 each; 2 telephone operators, at $720 each; messenger to the Secretary, $1,000; 5 messengers; 5 assistant messengers; 9 messenger boys, at $480 each; chief engineer and electrician, $1,400; assistant engineer, $1,000; skilled laborers—1, $1,000; 1, $900; 2 at $840 each; 5 at $720 each; 3 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 3 firemen; 16 laborers; cabinetmaker, $1,200; carpenter, $900; chief watchman, $900; 9 watchmen; 25 charwomen; in all, $196,050.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I notice that this provides for a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, an assistant to the Secretary, a private secretary to the Secretary, a confidential clerk to the Secretary, a private secretary to the Assistant Secretary, and a messenger to the Secretary. This assistant to the Secretary seems to be a new position. What authority of law is there for that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that the Secretary of Commerce is a very busy man.

Mr. WALSH. If he is going to have many more assistants he will have to be a pretty busy man.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He submitted an estimate for an assistant at $3,500. The committee heard him very fully on the subject, and became convinced that he ought to have an assistant, and recommended an assistant's place at $2,750. This is to assist him in taking care of the work of the office and permitting him to give less attention to certain details that can be attended to by an assistant, so that he may give more of his attention to some of the larger matters which pertain to the office of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. WALSH. I know; but the Secretary of the Navy is a very busy man, and the Secretary of Agriculture is a very busy man.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will find that he has quite a number of assistants, too.

Mr. WALSH. Who?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; we provided for those by special legislation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the Secretary of the Navy has quite a number of assistants.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; he is given an Assistant Secretary and a private secretary, but apparently he has not a messenger. The Secretary of the Interior has an Assistant Secretary and a First Assistant Secretary. Now, the Secretary of Commerce is, as the gentleman says, a very busy man. He has many important bureaus under his jurisdiction; but in view of the sort of retrenchment that is pleasant to talk about sometimes, and to read about, it sems to me, unless there is some further reason than the gentleman has given for the necessity to create this position, that the Assistant Secretary, the private secretary to the Secretary, the confidential clerk to the Secretary, and the private secretary to the Assistant Secretary ought to be sufficient.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Let me read to the gentleman what the Secretary of Commerce had to say on this subject, because, of course, he can present his reasons much better than I can.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to have the gentleman read it again. I have glanced over it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Before I do that, the gentleman referred to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior has a First Assistant and an Assistant Secretary.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is only one Assistant Secretary in the Department of Commerce. Here is what the Secretary of Commerce had to say:

I think you must be aware, Mr. Chairman, that the pressure of work which has been on the War, Navy, and Treasury Departments is now falling on us. It is coming upon us so hard that I am obliged to keep four stenographers busy myself with my own personal mail. The assistant to the secretary, who is mentioned in the second line, is already at work, and has been at work for months. He was borrowed because we had no appropriation for him, and we were overwhelmed with work. We are pressed now beyond our power, and the work is getting greater all the time. With the aid of four or five assistants this morning I have had to still leave two-thirds of my mail untouched. I can only say that this assistant is to-day at work, borrowed from the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and he is most urgently required with the increasing and growing demand for his services. I do not know what I could do without him. In fact, I can not do the work without him at all. As to the clerical force, I may say that my force is working every night until 6 o'clock. I rarely leave my own office before that time, and I frequently have to carry my papers home with me in order to read them.

There are papers now on my desk at home that I have not been able to read at all. If I am called out of town I esteem it a blessing, since it affords me an opportunity to catch up with the reading of papers.

So I think, and the committee thought, that in view of the extra amount of work devolving upon the Secretary of Commerce, he ought to have an assistant to look after the details of his office and assist him with some of his correspondence.

Mr. WALSH. Still further reserving the point of order, did the committee make any inquiry as to the nature of this extra work that is piling in on the Department of Commerce at this particular time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is work that comes through the Bureau of Standards and work that comes through the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Then, again, during the next two or three years we are going to be taking the census.

Mr. WALSH. And we are going to make an appropriation for that, are we not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; but that will require a good deal of the time and attention of the Secretary of Commerce, because he is at the head of that department, and in the end is responsible for the taking of the census, although, of course, the work will be done by the Director of the Census. So that will increase his work necessarily to some extent. Then, of course, the gentleman knows that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is spreading out, and there is quite an increased appropriation carried in this bill for that bureau. Then the Bureau of Standards has increased wonderfully in the last few years.

Mr. WALSH. That increase of late years has been due very much to war activities.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A great deal of this activity has been in connection with the War and Navy Departments, but not altogether confined to that, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. I know the present Secretary of Commerce is a very competent, efficient, and hard-working official, and that he probably would not make this recommendation unless he felt that the efficiency of his department would be affected by the absence of an extra assistant. Having that knowledge, and being persuaded by the convincing statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Census: For salaries and necessary expenses for preparing for, taking, compiling, and publishing the Fourteenth Census of the United States; for rent of office quarters outside the District of Columbia, alterations and repairs to buildings, construction of fireproof vaults, and for carrying on during the decennial census period all other work authorized and directed by law, including purchase, construction, and repair of card-punching, card-sorting, and card-tabulating machinery; experimental work in developing, improving, and constructing an integrating counter for use in statistical work; repairs to such machinery and other mechanical appliances; technical and mechanical services in connection therewith, and purchase, rental, construction, repair, and exchange of equipment and mechanical appliances; and including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $15,000,000, to continue available until June 30, 1922: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend during the decennial census period such work of the Census Office, other than the Fourteenth Census, as he may deem advisable.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph, and I think I shall make it. I do not quite understand why this provision should have been incorporated in this bill, striking out the personnel that has been heretofore carried in the legislative bill, and appropriating a lump sum, particularly when the legislation for the Fourteenth Census has just been sent to conference by the other branch of the Congress to-day.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the point of order is well taken, because there is a law now on the statute books authorizing the taking of the census. The law passed 10 years ago provided for the taking of that census and of subsequent censuses.

Mr. WALSH. That is true; but there is no law on the statute books authorizing the wiping out of this personnel that has been fixed by law and has been heretofore carried in the legislative bill, and appropriating a lump sum in this language, permitting the expenditure in this manner.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This does not undertake to eliminate the permanent force of the Census Bureau. I will say to the gentleman that in making this recommendation the committee has followed the course pursued 10 years ago, when $10,000,000 was appropriated in a lump sum, out of which the permanent employees were to be paid and also the temporary employees.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman will find that 10 years ago the legislation was carried in the bill after the census bill proper had been enacted.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not so certain about that; but if that be true, it was probably due to the fact that perhaps there was no law at that time authorizing it. As I said to the gentleman, there is a law now on the statute books which not only authorizes the taking of the census but absolutely requires it.

Mr. WALSH. If that is so, what is the need of passing this Fourteenth Decennial Census bill that we spent days on and which has just passed the other body and has been by it sent to conference? If there is a law, what was the necessity of our passing another law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not able to advise the gentleman, particularly as I am not on the Census Committee, but I take it that it was for the purpose of adding other activities.

Mr. WALSH. That could be done by amending the other law instead of passing a new census law in toto. If this paragraph is enacted and substituted in the legislative bill for the language carried last year, will the gentleman state what will become of the Director of the Census at $6,000 a year, 5 chief statisticians, and 20 clerks of class 4, and so forth.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the bill now pending in conference——

Mr. FOSTER. It has not been sent to conference.

Mr. WALSH. The Senate has asked for a conference.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If that bill does not pass, then the Director of the Census would get $7,000 instead of $6,000 under the law that is now on the statute books, which provides that the Director of the Census shall receive $7,000, the private secretary to the director, $2,250, the assistant director, $5,000, the chief statisticians $3,000 each, the chief clerk $2,500, and so on. Of course when the bill that recently passed the Senate becomes a law it will supersede this, and I do not recall just what the salaries fixed in that are. I think the House fixed the same salary for the Director of the Census in that bill.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; we increased his salary.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; we did not increase it; we left it at just what it was 10 years ago.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman will remember that the bill which has recently been passed by the other branch and on which they have asked for a conference was a bill providing for the Fourteenth Decennial Census, outlining the topics which should be included in that census. This is the permanent establishment that the legislative bill provides for—for the work of the bureau—when they are not engaged in the decennial census, and you are substituting a lump sum of $15,000.000 in the legislative bill for the personnel of a bureau which is now included in another bill, providing for the Fourteenth Decennial Census, which is not yet a law, and you are leaving the personnel, provided for in the last year's legislative bill, out of the question entirely, the number of clerks, and so forth, substituting something that is not authorized by law, because we have not yet passed the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon, it is authorized by law.

Mr. WALSH. I can not agree with the gentleman. There is no legislation authorizing the taking of the Fourteenth Decennial Census and authorizing the technical and mechanical services in connection therewith, the exchange of equipment, the construction of fireproof vaults, and for the repair of card-punching, card-sorting, card-tabulating machinery, experimental work, repairs to such machinery, and personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field. The law for the Thirteenth Census simply required that at the end of 10 years another census should be taken, but it did not restrict that department to the method or to the personnel used 10 years ago. We have provided for that in the bill which passed here weeks ago.

Mr. ASWELL. The Constitution requires it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman suggests that the Constitution requires it. Of course the Constitution requires it, but the Constitution does not provide for a director at $7,000 a year. The Constitution merely requires that the Congress shall enact legislation under which a census can be taken, and we are engaged upon that now, and yet when that legislation has not been enacted you wipe out the personnel of this office that has been carried in the legislative bill for years and substitute for that a lump-sum appropriation of $15,000,000, carrying various other authorizations.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The act of July 2, 1909, which I hold in my hand, provides that a census of the population, agriculture, manufacture, mines, and quarries of the United States shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1910 and every 10 years thereafter. That is clearly authority for making the appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. It is not authority for building fireproof vaults and the other things contained in this paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will recall that in the committee I had difficulty in understanding the position taken by the chairman that if we voted this lump-sum appropriation that would not supersede the statutory roll that is provided under existing law. I have not been able to become convinced that if we appropriate a fund of $15,000,000 for taking the decennial census the statutory roll will not virtually be obliterated and that the Director of the Census will not have the privilege of placing in the various classes of clerks all whom he may see fit to appoint.

Mr. WALSH. At any salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. And at any salary. I really think if this provision is going to be retained we should provide the statutory roll as it exists in the present law and then provide the additional amount for the Fourteenth Decennial Census, otherwise there will be no statutory roll at the conclusion of the decennial period. I know that it is the purpose of the chairman to retain the present statutory roll, and if we wipe it out in this bill, as we do by making this lump-sum appropriation, there will be no statutory roll at the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Why, the gentleman knows that exactly this form of appropriation was made 10 years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. By a separate act independent of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The same act I hold in my hand, the same act obtains in reference to this census as the other.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill carried a statutory roll then. That act was supplemental to it and had to be taken in conjunction with it. That was a special act passed June 29, 1909, which provided for an appropriation of $10,000,000. I am in sympathy with the idea of appropriating a lump sum at the present time, but I do not think it is necessary, if we are going to retain the present statutory roll, to provide it in this bill, otherwise it is wiped out.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I differ with the gentleman in that respect. As a matter of fact I think that it was the desire of the committee that this special work that is being done by the census should be eliminated as far as possible during the decennial period and that those on the permanent roll should be employed in the conduct of the census.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the idea; I was strongly in favor of that position.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And it seems now——

Mr. STAFFORD. But I do not believe that provision for these clerks should be abolished, and we are abolishing them now if we appropriate the lump sum for that purpose.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I submit to the gentleman they are not abolished by any means.

Mr. WALSH. Where is there any law continuing—where will there be any law continuing—these?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The law to which I have just referred.

Mr. WALSH. That does not set out any roll.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It says in addition to the force employed in the Census Office there shall be certain positions and then sets out those positions. Now, that is the law that is now on the statute books, and it will be the law until it is superseded or repealed by some other law. That law says that in addition to the force now employed in the Census Office there shall be the following additional positions.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but if the gentleman will make inquiry will not he find that the——

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit me to finish this question—that law of 10 years ago was passed before the act requiring these additional employees was passed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. WALSH. Was not the legislative, executive, and judicial bill of 10 years ago passed before the census bill was passed, and did not the legislative bill of 10 years ago carry substantially this very paragraph which was in the legislative bill of last year but which is eliminated this year? It carried the statutory roll, but we passed the census bill and said in addition to the employees on the statutory roll contained in the legislative bill which was passed they should have these other employees and we appropriated $10,000,000 in a lump sum. Now, you are trying to pass the legislative bill first, as I think it ought to be, and I submit that we ought to carry the statutory roll, and then in passing the census bill it will say in addition to those carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill these other employees shall be——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Here is the effect of the gentleman's contention. If we were to do that——

Mr. WALSH. That is what we did 10 years ago.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What we are trying to do here by making this lump-sum appropriation is to get a force for the Director of the Census which will be mobile or elastic.

Mr. WALSH. That should be done in the census bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. So that he can devote the services of those employed thereunder to the activities that he thinks most important. Now, if we undertake here to carry a force on our permanent roll and then to make a lump-sum appropriation, gentlemen will find that a great deal of work will be done in the Census Bureau in the next few years that might be eliminated while we are taking this census——

Mr. WALSH. No; that is the very thing——

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman believe that it is clear that this bill provides for the decennial period only, and when that period expires the permanent law takes up the permanent roll again?

Mr. WALSH. The decennial period never expires. They will be working on the Fourteenth Census 15 years after we take it.

Mr. ASWELL. I call attention to this suggestion, too: If you include the roll as it has passed this House and the other branch already you would have to increase the appropriation $20,500,000 instead of $15,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate the point the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] makes, and I know he has given a great deal of thought to this matter, because the census bill came out of his committee and he had charge of it when it was under consideration here a month ago. But I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] how matters would be complicated, and if they would not be in a way safeguarded if we inserted the paragraph in the legislative bill of last year in here under the Bureau of the Census and then followed it up by this language to which I am reserving the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I can not see the necessity of appropriating for the permanent roll specifically, and I am fearful if that was done there might be work that would be done in the Census Bureau during the next fiscal year that could very properly be eliminated and the entire force put upon this census work, so as to get results as quickly as possible. And certainly, in view of the act I have referred to and the additional act of March 6, 1902, which I hold in my hand, there can be no necessity for it.

Mr. WALSH. But if the gentleman will look at the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for 1909, the year the last census bill was passed, he will find, I think, that it carried the statutory roll.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But I want to direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that the language of the provision carrying the lump-sum appropriation of $15,000,000 carries a proviso that they shall not do any other work except as connected with the Fourteenth Decennial Census. So, if you incorporate the statutory roll there and then follow it up by this language you will see that they could not do extraneous work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me, so that I may correct an error?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the chairman of the committee is correct in the position he took in the subcommittee that the statutory roll would remain intact at the end of the decennial period as it exists in the present legislative bill. Since I first took the floor I have sent for a copy of the bill as it passed the House. I wish to direct the attention of the committee to the following language, which rather corroborates that position.

Mr. WALSH. Before the gentleman proceeds, what would happen if we passed this and the bill the gentleman has in his hands fails and does not get out of conference? Where would you be then?

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the census would be taken under the act of 1909, providing for the last decennial census.

Mr. WALSH. Where would the statutory roll be?

Mr. STAFFORD. The statutory roll would be in the same position at the end of the decennial period as far as the bill is concerned that is pending at present in the two Houses, there is no question. May I read it?

SEC. 3. That during the decennial census period, and no longer, there may be employed in the Census Office, in addition to the force provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial census, an assistant director.

It enumerates certain employees. Section 6 has this language:

That in addition to the force hereinbefore provided for and to that authorized by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial census period, there may be employed in the Census Office during the decennial census period, and no longer, as many clerks with salaries at the rates of $1,800—

And so forth.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know if that is in the bill the conference on which has been asked for?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have only a copy of the bill as it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That provision will not be in conference, because there was no change made in that by the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sends to the gentleman a copy of the act under which the last census was taken. It might clear this matter up.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that we are following exactly the practice that was followed 10 years ago. There is absolutely no difference in what this bill proposes to do and what was done 10 years ago.

Mr. WALSH. Ten years ago it was not carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was in a bill presented by the Appropriations Committee in a special act, dated June 29, after the legislative bill had probably been prepared. It was carried the next year, and the next year, in the legislative bill. The first act was passed in the Sixty-first Congress and was approved June 20, 1909, and it was a separate act, and was not a substitute for the statutory roll. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for that year carried the employees, specifying the salaries and number of clerks, and so forth.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any objection to passing this paragraph over temporarily?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There was nothing in the legislative bill providing for the permanent roll for 1910.

Mr. WALSH. No; but it carried the usual number of employees specified, as it had for several years previous. Will the gentleman have any objection to passing this paragraph temporarily?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I am willing to let it go if we can read the bill and get along some.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, this paragraph will be passed over temporarily. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses, including field investigations in the United States and abroad, purchase of documents, plans, specifications, manuscripts, and all other publications for the promotion of the commercial interests of the United States, exchange on official checks, and rent outside the District of Columbia, to further promote and develop the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, $325,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That not more than $50,000 of the foregoing sum shall be used for the expenses of branch offices: Provided further, That all moneys hereafter received by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in payment of photographic and other mechanical reproduction of special statistical compilations from its records shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee why this large increase in this item? It is $150,000 or $200,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That increase was recommended by the committee because the committee feels that there is absolutely nothing more important confronting the United States at this time than the extension of its foreign and domestic commerce. We felt that that was really a very slight increase when you take into consideration just what the conditions are at the present time and the necessity and importance of this Government doing just what other countries are doing.

Mr. WALSH. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman; and if that is the purpose of it I submit that it is not a sufficiently large increase. I am going to withdraw my pro forma amendment and move to strike out "$325,000" and insert "$500,000."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is more than the Secretary of Commerce asked for.

Mr. WALSH. Then I will make it $400,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 119, line 4, strike out "$325,000" and insert "$400,000."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Tennessee has indicated, the purpose of this appropriation is to seek to increase our foreign trade and to develop new markets, something which every one of the belligerent nations, I think, without exception, has already undertaken, and vast strides are being made on the part of France and Great Britain especially to develop markets in parts of the world where heretofore they have not had a very large commerce, although there are very few places where one of those nations has not heretofore had its agents.

Now, I submit that to increase this amount to half a million dollars, or to $400,000, the director having asked for $435,000, would not be money ill spent, and in the face of the cry for retrenchment it would be a wise thing to increase that appropriation, and to that extent hold out some encouragement to the business interests of the country that when peace comes we shall have made investigations and studies and surveys of the situations abroad whereby our industries and these men who are coming back to take part in the work of production may find markets for their goods and products. I trust you gentlemen will accept this slight increase of $75,000 which I offered as an amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I certainly concur with the gentleman as to the very great importance of this work, but I want to call the attention of the gentleman and also of the committee to the fact that we have increased the appropriation for this bureau possibly more by way of comparison than any other bureau in the Government. In other words, for the current year this bureau has had an appropriation of $554,120. We have recommended in this bill $910,510, or an increase of more than $376,000.

That is a very substantial increase, and I think it evidences the interest of the committee and of the House and their desire to see everything done that is possible to promote and develop our foreign commerce. This in itself is an increase from $125,000 to $325,000, or an increase of $200,000, a great deal more than double what this particular appropriation has been during the past. And the gentleman will observe that there are other appropriations in the bill for use by this Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. They have money for the Orient; they have money for South and Central America, and then they have commercial attachés.

Mr. WALSH. Yes. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the gentleman will admit that we could do more work and derive more benefit from the expenditure of $400,000 than we could from the expenditure of $125,000. This is not confined to the Orient or to South America, evidently, because those two places are mentioned in other paragraphs of the bill. This fund would be used in seeking information in other sections of the globe.

Now, it would seem to me, in view of conditions as we hope they may be after peace shall have come, that Congress ought at this time to say to the Nation: "We want to give you all the information we can get within reasonable bounds, and we are willing to appropriate generously for procuring information whereby we can provide means of stimulating our business and commercial activities and whereby we can furnish to the people who are producing things and who are going to make use of this vast merchant marine which we hope to have information as to what ports that merchant marine shall go to and carry the goods and engage in the commerce with parts of the world in which now the commercial interests of the United States are strangers." I trust the gentleman will see that $75,000 is not an extravagant increase in the appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. The estimate for this item is $435,000. Out of this item are paid eight district offices in this country which disseminate the information to be collected from the commercial agents who are traveling in foreign countries and from the commercial attachés. It was the intention and purpose of the Secretary of Commerce to establish 15 additional local offices in this country. We thought that there was no pressing need for the establishment of merely paid agencies in 15 cities additional to those already established at the principal commercial centers, and accordingly we placed a limitation on the expenditure of $50,000 that could be used in this country for the existing agencies. If we had provided for the establishment of these 15 agencies it would have required, perhaps, an appropriation of maybe $100,000 additional; but we have granted virtually the estimate of the Secretary of Commerce, as far as activities in foreign countries are concerned, by granting this appropriation of $325,000, when we placed that limitation of $50,000 that could be expended in this country for the maintenance of branch agencies. We have granted the department virtually every cent it asked for its activities in foreign fields. We did not grant the estimate for the establishment of 15 branch offices to be located throughout the country.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that it would be a national calamity if in this one important respect you gave the department a little more than it asked for, as an indication of our interest and our generosity toward the commerce of this country in the event that peace shall have returned?

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, Mr. Chairman, after the gentleman has served on an appropriations committee he may realize that the department usually estimates for the full amount that it can possibly expend, and in this particular instance we have virtually granted their estimate for their activities outside of this country.

Mr. WALSH. I can not agree with that statement. They asked for $435,000, and you have given them $325,000, and you have said that only $50,000 of that can be expended for branch offices.

Mr. STAFFORD. At present there are eight branch offices located in this country.

Mr. WALSH. How about branch offices abroad?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no limit on them.

Mr. WALSH. Not more than $50,000 shall be used for the expenses of branch offices. It does not say in this country. It says for branch offices. It might include branch offices abroad, and limit the expenditure for that. We ought to have 200 branch offices abroad, and we ought to have them established by this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that was an oversight on the part of the committee. It was intended that that proviso should limit the expenditure for branch offices in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 2, noes 8.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The clerk read as follows:

For technical investigations in cooperation with the industries upon fundamental problems involved in industrial development following the war, with a view to assisting in the permanent establishment of the new American industries developed during the war, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $50,000, to be available immediately.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, H. R. 14078, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. SEARS, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family (at the request of Mr. CLARK of Florida).

To Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, indefinitely, on account of illness (at the request of Mr. PURNELL).

To Mr. ROBBINS, for three days, on account of important business (at the request of Mr. ROSE).

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 4554. An act for the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain in Minnesota; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman feel that it is necessary to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow in order to conclude the consideration of this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do, Mr. Speaker. I think it is certainly best to do that, for this reason: The gentleman knows that the Census Bureau has been passed over. The gentleman from Colorado came to me this evening and asked that we might have liberal debate upon the salary proposition. Then there is provision for a joint commission that is going to create some discussion.

Mr. WALSH. A point of order will be made on that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If a point of order is made it will go out, because it is clearly subject to a point of order; but if no point of order is made we may be here for several hours, and I think that the gentleman should agree to meet at 11 o'clock. Then we would be certain to get through with this bill in time to get a decent hot dinner, which we have not been able to do for several days.

Mr. WALSH. If we do meet at 11 o'clock, is it intended to take up anything else besides this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not say.

Mr. WALSH. I think the House ought to know that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he will not recognize anybody for anything unless it is of pressing necessity.

Mr. WALSH. With that understanding, I will not object to meeting at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, January 18, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SPEECH OF GOV. ALLEN, OF KANSAS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have a copy of the speech of Gov. Allen, of Kansas, in regard to the Thirty-fifth Division going into the Battle of the Argonne Forest with a lack of supplies and without adequate support by artillery and airplanes. I ask that it be noted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before that goes in the RECORD I should like to know what is in that speech.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is the speech of Gov. Allen, of Kansas, with reference to the Battle of the Argonne Forest and the fact that the men of the Thirty-fifth Division were sent into that battle unprepared and without supplies. I wish to have the speech referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, hoping that the committee will give some consideration to and investigate the charges made by Gov. Allen.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think it is all right to refer this matter to the Committee on Military Affairs, and after the committee have passed upon it, if they think it is a matter that ought to go into the RECORD, well and good; but it is now proposed to put in the RECORD the speech of a man who is not a Member of this body and not a Member of the other body.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not ask that it be printed in the RECORD; I asked that it be noted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. REED. I misunderstood the request of the Senator. I have no objection in the world to that being done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon in the consideration of the pending bill, which was then before the Senate, an amendment was adopted on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] increasing the salaries of the judges as provided in the bill by the House from $7,500 for district judges and $8,500 for circuit judges to $9,000 and $10,000, respectively. I voted for that amendment, because I think our judges, of all the people in Government service, should be well paid, and I know how insufficient, in my part of the country at least, the present salaries are.

I have consulted, however, with a number of friends of the bill who think as I do that the increase proposed by the amendment might be injurious to the passage of the bill and endanger its passage. For that reason I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, since that amendment was adopted the consensus of opinion of the Senate has been taken, and while I do not believe the amount is too high I think Senators generally feel that the amendment should be reconsidered. Under those circumstances rather than imperil the passage of the bill I have no objection to its reconsideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think there is some question as to whether we should leave the amounts named in the bill as sent from the House or whether they might be increased to $8,000 and $9,000, respectively, for district and circuit judges. I should like to have the chairman of the committee state whether he would object to increasing the salaries or whether he deems it advisable to increase the salaries to $8,000 and $9,000, respectively.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Personally, I would be glad to see the salaries increased to $8,000 and $9,000, but there is a difference of opinion whether, as a matter of policy with reference to the passage of the legislation, it would be best to retain the House figures or whether we ought to fix the salaries at $8,000 and $9,000. I am unable to give an opinion that would be of much value on that point. I am perfectly willing myself to vote for salaries of $8,000 and $9,000 and take it into conference, or I am willing to leave the salaries at $7,500 and $8,500 and send the bill back to the House without amendment in that respect.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am inclined to yield my judgment in this matter to the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Georgia and therefore make no motion for an increase. If the Senator from Minnesota thinks it well to make a motion to increase the salaries to $8,000 and $9,000, I shall vote for that amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Can that amendment be moved when the bill is in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not wish to take the responsibility to advise the Senate what it should do in that regard. I made the other motion and I am willing that it should be taken up in the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smith, Md.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is detained on account of illness.

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] on account of illness, and also of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] on account of a death in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, yesterday evening before adjournment I presented an amendment to the bill. I do not believe it has been printed in bill form, but it appears on page 1661 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There was no yea-and-nay vote, but the vote, on a division, was so close, and so many Senators have importuned me to renew the amendment in the Senate that I do so. I now ask that the amendment be read, and I desire to have a vote on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to concurring in those amendments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. My recollection is that there was an amendment placing the judges of Hawaii and Porto Rico on the same basis as the district judges in this country. I understand the provision as it now stands gives these judges a higher salary than the present United States judges of Alaska get. If that is true then I want to have the Alaskan judges put on the same basis as the others, because to my mind there is much more reason why they should get a higher salary than the judges of Porto Rico and Hawaii.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not hear to what judges the Senator refers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. My recollection is that an amendment was adopted placing the United States judges of Hawaii and Porto Rico on the same basis as the other judges. I wish to add an amendment to that amendment placing the judges of the Territory of Alaska on the same basis.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment extended only to district judges, not to general judges.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all I want.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was stated at the time that the judges in Alaska already receive $7,500.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I think the Senator is mistaken. I understand they receive $7,000.

Mr. MYERS rose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Montana, I think, can state what they receive.

Mr. MYERS. My information from authentic sources is that the United States district judges for the Territory of Alaska receive each a salary of $7,500 per year. I can not vouch for that statement, but I have been so informed. If, as the Senator from Washington says, the salary is $7,000 a year, then they are already on a pay basis where they will receive the minimum salary that the bill provides.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The minimum is $7,500, is it not?

Mr. MYERS. I must retract that statement because the Senate committee amendment to the bill was defeated yesterday. I overlooked that fact. The sum of $7,000 for the Alaskan judges is on a par with what would have been the minimum salary provision of the bill if the amendment of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary had been adopted, but it was defeated. Therefore, I withdraw my statement. I do not know how a salary of $7,500 per year would compare with the minimum salary provided by the bill in its present form.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand the minimum now in the bill is $7,500. I am not sure whether the judges of Alaska get $7,000 or $7,500; I have not had an opportunity to look it up; but I think they ought to be put on the same basis as the other judges.

Mr. MYERS. I can not speak with positive authority, and therefore I do not make a positive statement about the salaries of the Alaskan Federal judges.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask the Chair if it is in order at this time to propose an amendment to the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole, or whether after the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in I can offer a new amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, this is so muddled the bill had better go back to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is also an amendment to the House provision.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Iowa suggests to me that the amendments, with reference to Porto Rico and Hawaii, was also made to the text of the bill, and so they are now a part of the House provision if it is adopted by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, we will take the bill back to the Committee of the Whole, and it is now in order to insert "Alaska."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move to insert "Alaska" after "Porto Rico and Hawaii."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill now reads as agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

SEC. 2. Each of the district judges, including the judges in Porto Rico and Hawaii, exercising Federal jurisdiction, shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year, to be paid in monthly installments.

It is now proposed to strike out the word "and," between "Porto Rico" and "Hawaii," and insert a comma, and after "Hawaii" to insert "and Alaska," so that it will read:

Each of the district judges, including the judges in Porto Rico, Hawaii, and Alaska, exercising Federal jurisdiction, shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year, to be paid in monthly installments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senate has determined that Hawaii and Porto Rico should be included on the same basis as the other district judges. I think it no more than fair that Alaska should be included as well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Washington is agreed to. Are there further amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I voted yesterday for the amendment to the House text, and I believe that is the best solution of this problem.

The question has been raised here as to the salaries paid judges in different parts of the country. In my State the supreme court judges residing and holding court in the city of New York are paid $17,500 a year, while the judges in that part of the State outside of the city of New York performing the same sort of service and with the same jurisdiction receive the sum of $10,000 a year. When the judges from districts outside of New York City sit in that city, as they do very often, they receive the same compensation that the city of New York judges do.

Mr. President, the difference in the pay of these judges comes from the fact that it costs a great deal more to live in the city of New York than in other parts of the State. In the city of New York we pay our police magistrates $8,000 a year, $2,000 a year more than we pay the United States district judges. We pay our municipal court judges, the judges who pass upon landlord and tenant cases and upon cases involving less than a thousand dollars, the sum of $8,000 a year. We pay our county judges, who pass on criminal cases almost entirely, $10,000 a year.

When a United States district judge comes to New York from another State to hold court, and we have them there nearly all the time, we allow them $10 a day additional and traveling expenses. So their pay while they are holding court in the city of New York is really more than it would be if they were at home, for at home they must take care of their own living expenses.

Why should compensation be higher in New York? There are many reasons, and the same idea is carried out in all sorts of business. I happened the other day to look up the wages paid carpenters in that city. I find that in that city a carpenter working eight hours receives $6.50 a day, while a carpenter in some other cities of New York State receives $5 a day, and in the smaller cities to the South and West they receive as low as $3 and $4 a day. These are the rates fixed by the labor union, all of these unions being attached to the American Federation.

So the labor unions of the country recognize the difference in cost of living in the larger cities.

I believe also that it is a fact, although I have not the record before me, that the judges in the larger cities, where they are constantly engaged, do more work than do the judges in the small communities, and that ought to entitle them to a larger compensation. But we get back, Mr. President, always to the fact that it costs more to live in the large cities; that is universally recognized throughout the land in every sort of business. For my part, I believe the Senate committee amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question. Why not apply the same rule to Members of the Senate?

Mr. CALDER. Of course, representing in part the most populous State in the Union, I would hardly want to suggest that my pay should be more than that of the distinguished Senator from Michigan; but I will say to him, Mr. President, that, in a sense, that rule ought to apply, because, by reason of the fact that I represent a larger State, I have a great deal more business to attend to than have many other Senators, and I am compelled to-day, as do many judges in the larger communities, to pay out of my own pocket considerable money to provide for my own office force and to take care of the business of my State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That would apply equally to Senators coming from smaller States; but I want to suggest to the Senator from New York that United States district judges from Michigan sit in the district courts of New York State. They are called there because of their ability, because of their fitness for those posts; and under the plan the Senator proposes one district judge would sit beside another district judge who was getting more pay, and for no reason in the world except that there was a greater population surrounding him than there happened to be surrounding the district judge from Michigan. How can the Senator reconcile such a distinction, when both judges are performing exactly the same service much of the time?

Mr. CALDER. There is much in what the Senator from Michigan says, Mr. President, but I would remind him that when the judges from Michigan come to New York—and we welcome them; the judges of his State are great judges and they perform their services very satisfactorily—the Government allows them $10 a day extra. That takes care of their living expenses while they are in New York; and it is a very attractive opportunity for them; they delight to come, and we are very glad to have them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, of course New York is a very attractive city, one of the green spots in the desert of Sahara; people like to go there, and in the next few months probably many people will go there who have not been in the habit of going there often, for various reasons; but, nevertheless, to make that kind of a distinction among jurists who are performing solemn duties and passing upon cases of very great importance—and the litigation in my State is of equal importance with the litigation which confronts the courts in New York; many of the questions are of the utmost importance, and we have on the bench in Michigan men of eminence and character—I think is very unfair, indeed. It is a false basis to make the compensation for judges depend upon the State or the district from which they come.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I should have no objection to amending this bill so as to provide that when judges from Michigan or any other part of the country come to communities where the pay is higher that they should receive that higher pay. I have pointed out that we make the same distinction in my own State between judges living in different parts of that State. The supreme court judges in the rural sections receive $7,500 a year less than in New York City, but when they come to New York City to hold court they are allowed the same compensation as are judges who reside in New York City.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say further, if the Vice President and the Senator from New York will permit me, that I have been in very great sympathy with the disposition of the State of New York to pay their jurists good salaries; I believe in that; they should be made independent of every other consideration in the performance of such duties as fall to their lot; but I can not agree with the Senator from New York and I am unable to view the situation as he does, that judges holding equally responsible positions in other sections of the country should be paid less than those who happen to live in the more populous regions.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that I can not agree with the Senator from Michigan. But, aside from the Senate committee amendment, I hope that some legislation on this subject will be enacted. If the Senate amendment shall not be passed, then let us pass the House provision. That would be a step in the right direction. We are having a great deal of trouble in New York in securing good men for these places, though that condition may not exist in other parts of the country. Only last year one of the United States district judges in my own district resigned, and within the last four years two of the judges in the southern district of New York, which includes the old city of New York, resigned their places, and in these cases we had great difficulty in getting the right sort of men to fill the vacancies. When we pay a police magistrate in the city of New York $8,000, the municipal court judge $8,000, a county judge $10,000, a supreme court judge $17,500, and the United States district judge only $6,000, he having even a more important place than has the New York supreme court judge, then, indeed, you can understand the feeling on this subject in that city.

Mr. President, our State pays into the Federal Treasury very nearly one-third of all the taxes which are collected in the country. We are perfectly willing to contribute a little more toward what we believe to be the very excellent plan proposed in this measure, and I trust it will meet with the approval of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is still open to amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator in charge of the bill requests that I withhold my amendment at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Arizona has reserved his amendment in the Senate, and I have suggested to him that he might raise the question involved in his amendment after the bill has passed into the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. That is correct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I want to ask a question for information from some member of the committee who can give it. There seems to be some doubt about it as the bill now stands. Does the chief justice of the Court of Claims receive more than do the members of that court?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think he does.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the parliamentary situation to be that, so far as the Senator from Arizona is concerned, his amendment was defeated as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true; but I reserved the amendment so that there might be a separate vote on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There can be no reservation made. The Senator's amendment was defeated as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ASHURST. But not in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can again offer the amendment when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What the Senator from Arizona did was to call attention to the fact that he desired to reserve the amendment in the Senate; and when the Senate concurs in all of the other amendments, that by unanimous consent his amendment should be voted on separately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But when an amendment is defeated as in Committee of the Whole it ought to be understood that a vote can not be reserved on it in the Senate, for there is nothing on which to vote. The Senator may reoffer the amendment in the Senate, if he chooses to do so. The Senate has had the bill under consideration as in Committee of the Whole, and has made certain amendments thereto. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before that is done I want to ask why it is that no additional salary is given to the presiding judge in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No additional salary is given to the presiding judge of any circuit court of appeals of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no presiding judge in those courts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; there is a presiding judge. The senior judge is the presiding judge, and acts always as the presiding judge when present. We reached the conclusion that the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia should be classified with the circuit courts of appeals throughout the United States; we are giving them the same treatment in connection with the increase of salary, and as there is no distinction between the presiding judge and the other judges of the circuit courts of appeals of the United States we saw no reason why a difference should exist between the chief justice and the other judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As I understand, there is no office called the "chief justice of the circuit court of appeals"; there is a practice under which the senior judge present at any time presides, but there is no chief justice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia there is a chief justice. Furthermore, I understand that in the bill as it came from the House the chief justice of the Court of Claims was given $500 additional salary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have put that court also in the status of the circuit courts of appeals. As I understand, we have classified the judges of the Court of Claims with the judges of the circuit courts of appeals of the United States; we have classified the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia with the circuit courts of appeals of the United States; we have classified the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia with the judges of the district courts of the United States; and, having taken that course, we have followed the practice throughout the United States of not discriminating as to the salaries between the presiding judge and the other members of the court.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is the intention, then, to harmonize the plan so as to equalize the salaries of the judges of the various courts?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is satisfactory to me. If it is done in one case, it should be done in all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it will be remembered that on last evening I offered an amendment, which does not appear to have been printed, except in the RECORD, where it will be found on page 1602. I will not ask that it be read; I believe I can make a statement that will be shorter and consume less time. Moreover, I feel that my argument or statement last night had more heat than light. So, if the Senate will be indulgent for two or three minutes, I will simply state the amendment.

Various bills have been introduced by different Senators proposing to provide for additional judges in States where the work was beyond the capacity of one particular judge. The first case that came before the Judiciary Committee was one from the State of New Jersey. The bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee; a favorable report was made; the bill passed the Senate, passed the House, and became a law. I was on the subcommittee that considered the New Jersey case and I recall distinctly that the courts of New Jersey were working far beyond the capacity that any man could work effectively, especially where serene thought is required.

Then came other bills of a similar character before the committee. One was a bill proposing to create an additional district judge in the State of Montana. The distinguished junior Senator from that State [Mr. WALSH] filed a very illuminating brief showing the necessity for an additional judge there. For the northern district of the State of California likewise an additional judge was provided; for the southern district of Florida an additional judge was provided, the judge of the court there being very much overworked by reason of the proximity of that district to Cuba, and hence frequent cases growing out of infractions of the customs laws—frequent cases of smuggling. In the case of Illinois two additional judges were provided for the northern district. In the case of Arizona there was also provided an additional judge. I will pause long enough to repeat what I said yesterday and what my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] said, that, with our 300 miles of Mexican border and many smuggling cases, 30,000 square miles of Indian reservations, and 18,000 square miles of forest reservations, the Federal court has many cases before it.

With reference to the State of North Carolina the western judicial district was found by the committee to require an additional judge. In the middle district of the State of Tennessee it was found that an additional judge was necessary; and in the State of Mississippi it was found that an additional judge was necessary.

So, Mr. President, each and every one of those bills passed the Senate, and my amendment is nothing more than a composition or gathering together of those bills which passed the Senate in the Sixty-fifth Congress providing for these additional judges. As I have said, the Judiciary Committee of the Senate considered all those bills. I was on one or two of the subcommittees, and I recall that in one of the cases—I have forgotten which one—the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] was a member of the subcommittee, and the argument had not proceeded 50 minutes when the Senator said, "I am entirely convinced, and I will agree readily to a favorable report on this bill. The present judge should be afforded relief." That was substantially the situation with reference to all of the cases—in the Montana case, in the California case, the Arizona case, the Florida case, and all of them.

If this amendment imperils the bill seriously or jeopardizes the bill in any way, I do not expect it to be insisted upon; but I submit that the people of this country have a right to have speedy adjudication of their litigation, and if Federal judges are needed here or needed there the Senate should grant them.

I said yesterday—I do not know that it is entirely parliamentary, but I will repeat it—that owing to the cluttered condition of legislation in another branch of Congress, I very much fear that this needed legislation covering these eight individual cases will not be acted upon favorably unless they are included as an amendment to this bill. That implies no reflection upon any other branch of Congress, but it is a situation that is always before us at the close of Congress. That is all I have to say upon the subject, and I yield the floor.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona. The middle district of Tennessee is at present without a judge. Tennessee is divided into three grand divisions—the eastern, the middle, and the western divisions. The eastern district has a judge and the western district has a judge, but the middle district does not have a judge, the Federal court in that district being presided over by a judge of the eastern district—Judge Sanford. This is the largest district in the State. The judge of the western district is Judge McCall, who has more than he can do now, as was shown by the evidence before the committee.

The Federal business in the middle district of Tennessee has increased over 100 per cent since 1913. The court is away behind in its docket. The judge can not possibly do the work, and at the same time perform the judicial work in the eastern district, according to all the facts as they have been adduced before the Judiciary Committee of both branches of Congress.

The bill creating a new judge for the middle district of Tennessee was introduced by my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] and brought before the committee of the Senate, which recommended its passage, and later on the Senate passed the bill. At the same time a like bill was introduced in the House. That bill was favorably recommended by the committee, and is now on the calendar of the House; but, in the press of business in the House, it is very doubtful whether it will be reached on the calendar. Most Senators probably will realize the parliamentary situation in the House from having served in that body, and they will know that at this late day it is almost impossible to get a bill of this kind through. The only reasonable opportunity that these bills have to become laws is for them to be put on a bill of this kind. The Senate having passed all of the bills, I hope that it will agree that they may be placed as an amendment upon this bill, so that they may become laws at this session.

The only cost to the Government will be the salary of the judge. The court room is there. The district attorney, the marshal, and all the other officers of the court are already existing. There will be no expense except the salary of the judge.

In connection with the Tennessee case, Mr. President, there is a very excellent report filed by Mr. NEELY, an able and distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee of the House, which report I ask to have inserted as part of my remarks. I repeat that I hope the amendment of the Senator from Arizona will be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report referred to by the Senator from Tennessee will be printed in the RECORD.

The report referred to is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1836) to provide for the appointment of a district judge in the middle judicial district of the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report it to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The State of Tennessee is divided into the eastern, western, and middle judicial districts. The eastern and western districts each has a judge. The middle district being without a judge, court is therein held by Judge Sanford, of the eastern district. The last annual report of the Attorney General shows that, for the fiscal year 1917, there were in the middle district of Tennessee 102 cases pending, 191 commenced, and 159 terminated. During the fiscal year 1916 there were 51 cases pending in this district, and for several years immediately prior to 1916 there were pending an average of 50 to 60 cases per year. It thus appears that during the year 1917 there was an increase of almost 100 per cent in the number of pending cases over any year recently preceding 1917, and that the docket in the middle district is becoming congested at a rapid rate.

The following letter, written to Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS from Hon. Lee Douglass, United States attorney for the middle district of Tennessee (found at p. 9 of the record of the hearings in this matter), concisely sets forth the more material facts upon which the committee bases its recommendations in the premises:

COMMITTEE ON THE TERRITORIES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, January 23, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I acknowledge your letter of January 3, in which you ask me to write you, giving information as to the present amount of business in the district court at Nashville and Cookeville, etc.

I am very glad, indeed, to give you this information, but before making any use of this letter I wish you would kindly get the permission of my superior, the Attorney General, which I am quite sure he would be glad to give.

On the occasion of the former attempted passage of the act to create a new judgeship for the middle district of Tennessee, I wrote a letter to the Attorney General which I understand was filed with the Judiciary Committee, and, inasmuch as portions of same were published in dispatches from Washington, I feel I am not violating any etiquette in inclosing you herewith a copy of this letter. You will notice that this letter is quite comprehensive and covers the matter fully up to June 23, 1916.

On page 2 of that letter you will notice that I inserted statistics from the published annual reports of the Attorney General showing the number of cases pending, commenced, and terminated in this district for the fiscal years 1913 and 1914, when my predecessor was in office, and for the fiscal years 1915 and 1916, during my administration. These statistics were as follows:

Fiscal year—	Pending.	Commenced.	Terminated.
1913	69	88	102
1914	55	117	124
1915	48	165	162
1916	51	264	213

You will note the increase in business in the fiscal years 1915 and 1916.

There has recently been published the Annual Report of the Attorney General for the year 1917. The statistics, as shown by this report for the fiscal year 1917 in the middle district of Tennessee, are as follows: Pending, 102; commenced, 191; terminated, 159.

You will see from this that the volume of business for the year ending June 30, 1917 (which was the fiscal year covered by the above), is substantially the same as the two preceding fiscal years, with this significant fact, that there were pending in 1917, 102 cases, whereas there were pending in 1916, 51 cases, and for the preceding years practically between 50 and 60 cases. In other words, the number of cases pending, due to continuances, etc., is over 100 per cent more than any preceding year.

I may say also that as the Attorney General's report was for the year ended June 30, 1917, it included but one term of court since the declaration of war, and that term was at Cookeville, and so shortly after the declaration of war that practically no cases growing out of a violation of the war statutes were ready for submission to the grand jury.

The espionage act, the selective-service act, the food-control bill, etc., have all been passed since the last term of court embraced in the Attorney General's report, and, of course, this report gives no record in the prosecutions under these various acts. These acts have served to largely increase the criminal business of the district court, which, as I said in my letter of June 23, and which was shown by the record, had steadily increased theretofore. While there was noticeable at the last term of court a small falling off in the number of prosecutions for bootlegging cases (carrying on the business of a retail liquor dealer without Government stamp), nevertheless this was more than offset by the number of prosecutions for violation of the Reed amendment. There were 23 cases at the last term for violation of this last-mentioned statute, and considerable time was consumed in the trial of these cases. As long as Kentucky is wet and Tennessee is dry these prosecutions are going to be inevitable, for the profit in the illicit transportation of whisky is so great as to tempt many people to violate the law.

At the Cookeville term last April we found it necessary to hold court for the same time as that referred to in my letter of June 23, 1916, and in addition it was necessary for Judge Sanford to hold night sessions.

Of course I do not know, except by reference to the Attorney General's report, of the volume of business that devolves upon Judge Sanford in holding his terms of court in the eastern district at Chattanooga, Knoxville, and Greenville. However, I think I can safely say, from what he has told me, that there has been no decrease in the volume of business at any of these places. An examination of the Attorney General's report shows, however, that my statement in my letter of June 23 still applies when applied to the present. The statement was that there were more criminal prosecutions pending, commenced, and terminated in either the middle or eastern district, presided over by Judge Sanford, than in the western district, presided over by Judge McCall. In other words, Judge Sanford, in his court, actually has more criminal business to dispose of in either one of his two districts than Judge McCall has in his entire district. The Attorney General's report for 1917 shows that in the eastern district there were pending 135 cases, there were commenced 153 cases, and there were terminated 170 cases. I have already shown the record of cases in the middle district. The Attorney General's report for 1917 shows that in the western district, presided over by Judge McCall, there were pending 47 cases, commenced 97 cases, and terminated 84 cases.

In regard to the civil business, I am only in position to speak authoritatively in regard to such civil cases as concern the Government. I believe this character of business is on the increase.

It is true, as you state, that Judge Sanford is a most conscientious judge in the performance of his duty and gives what might be called unusual time and attention to his duties, and I repeat what I said in my letter of June 23, that no one but a judge of his splendid ability and energy could have kept up the work of these two districts in anything like a satisfactory manner during the past two years.

Of course, Judge Sanford would wish to make his own statement about this matter, but I feel at liberty in saying that I have observed the strain which this work is putting upon him and know that it is almost a human impossibility for one man to do what he is trying to do, and I feel that he should have some relief. He has recently written me as follows:

"I can only say that I have been reluctantly driven to the conclusion, by the logic of the situation and the increased volume of business in the Federal courts, that it is impossible for one judge to keep up the work in the two districts with the promptness and thoroughness which the due administration of justice requires, and that, in my judgment, some measure of assistance in this work is required in the public interest."

With kindest regards, I am,
Very truly, yours,

LEE DOUGLAS,
United States Attorney.

It is a matter of common knowledge that, as a result of the war legislation recently enacted by Congress, the duties of every district judge have been multiplied and his labors enormously increased. While the facts as to the increase of business in the middle district of Tennessee by reason of the legislation last referred to are not available, it is nevertheless unquestionably true that the necessity for the appointment of a judge in this district is even more urgent than it was at the time the hearings in the premises were concluded, to wit, March 16, 1918.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there is a great deal of merit in what has been said by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I should like to say a word with respect to the Montana bill. It has twice passed this body and has never had consideration from the other branch of Congress. Not only is the court entirely overburdened with work, but there is in the report which was made to this body a letter sent here by the judge of the district court, who, by the way, was not appointed during this administration and is not politically in harmony with the party now in power, who sets out that the bill, if enacted into law, would operate to save to the Government of the United States $50,000 a year in the administration of justice in the State of Montana. Accompanying the report there is a statement showing that it costs more to run the United States district court in the State of Montana than in any other State in the Union. It costs almost as much as it does in the largest district in the Territory of Alaska, and the plain reason is that witnesses and jurors and marshals have to travel enormous distances in order to make service of process and to reach the court; so that really that bill is a measure of economy. It does not involve an additional expenditure upon the part of the Government of the United States. It will result in a saving of money to the United States, estimated by the judge of the court to amount to at least $50,000 a year.

These considerations have usually been persuasive in this body, but we have never been able in the other branch of Congress to get the matter on the floor, for some reason or other—just exactly why, I have never been able very well to ascertain. It occurs to me that this body might very appropriately again express its earnest desire to have these additional judges appointed in the districts in which they seem so very necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the only doubt I have about the amendment—having none on earth about its merits—is the apprehension I entertain as to the effect its adoption might have on the ultimate passage of the bill.

I do not know the condition in the other States; but I am glad that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], as he usually does in any case, gets at the very bottom of it in a very short time. He has stated a condition in Montana that appeals to me, as it does to him, because exactly the same condition surrounds the court in my own State. It travels thousands of miles in holding court at four separate places. The marshal, with his writs, travels thousands of miles, and the same is true of the selection of jurors, and so forth; and we made the four districts in order to help out the Federal Government in the discharge of the duties of that court.

I have no doubt that in my State on an average there are 200 prisoners in jail at a time for violating some Federal law, on account, as was suggested by my colleague, of our proximity to Mexico, with 300 miles or more of border line—you know exactly what that means without further statement—thousands, yes, millions on millions of acres of land in Government reserves and in Indian reservations, every one of them with Federal jurisdiction, and that crowds the court to such an extent that I have no fear in saying that we have an average of 200 prisoners in jail all the time. That at $2 a day would be $400 a day; and as a matter of simple economy—not only of justice to those poor wretches who are in the jails, but as a matter of economy on the part of the Congress—there ought to be some relief given by the appointment of another judge in that State. It is not a question of the district or of its machinery, but it could afford that when the Government saves thousands of dollars a year by it. So that while my whole sympathy is in favor of the amendment, my only fear is, as is known to all of us who are interested in these different bills, in regard to the effect that its adoption might have upon the bill in the other House, where, unfortunately, they have mixed up mere partisan questions with it that are natural, but are very regrettable under such conditions as these.

Therefore I feel something like my colleague has suggested. I should like to see the amendment agreed to, and I should like to see the Senate keep the amendment on the bill if it can, and I should like the Senate conferees to do their best to keep it on the bill; but, in spite of my fears as to the result, I can not refuse my assent to the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not adopt this amendment. The object is evident. It is said here that various separate bills have been passed by the Senate creating certain judges in various districts of the country, and they are pending in the House of Representatives. Now, in order to force the House of Representatives to pass those bills, we propose to tack them onto a bill fixing the salaries of the circuit and district judges in the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator speaks of forcing the House to pass those bills. I think that is not exactly correct, for this reason: Those bills have all been reported favorably by the House committee, and no doubt will pass the House if, under the rules, they can come up. It is just a question of getting them up, and in this way they will be gotten up.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is forcing the House, then, to take them up.

I think these bills ought to be considered in the House of Representatives and in this Chamber on their own foundation. The practice of lumping a lot of bills together and tacking them onto some other bill is a bad practice, and it is not fair. This bill ought to pass on its merits and ought not to be connected up with the bill creating additional judgeships in various circuits and districts in the United States. That is not the way to legislate, and it will endanger the passage of this bill, and I hope the Senate will not start in on any such practice as that.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to correct the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee. I wish to assure the Senator that I know that there is determined opposition to some of these bills in the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not mean to say that there is not opposition. There has been opposition to the bills all the time. I said that they had been favorably reported by the committee to the House.

Mr. KELLOGG. It might be that there should be a judge appointed in California and that there should not be a judge in some other district. It might be that there should be a judge in Pennsylvania and not in Minnesota. I do not think, however, that there is any claim for an additional judge in the latter State. But it is proposed here to take the whole, irrespective of the merits, and put them on this bill regulating the salaries of district and circuit judges of the United States and of Alaska, Porto Rico, and the District of Columbia.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did not the Senator vote for these very bills that have passed the Senate?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not remember whether I did or not. It does not make any difference. If I voted for every one of them and advocated every one of them, I would not put them on this bill, and I do not think it is good practice.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I have been on my feet two or three times trying to ask a question that may guide me in my vote on this amendment.

I am not posted on judicial matters, but I should like to ask the Senator who introduced the amendment, or some one who knows, whether the establishment of these eight judges—I believe there are eight—in the different places will require an additional number of United States district attorneys and marshals and an entirely new set of machinery to handle the courts after the judges are appointed in case they should be? In other words, will these States be redistricted?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me just to call attention to the condition of the Tennessee court—and I assume the condition is probably the same in other States, but I know this is true of Tennessee—there is a district attorney, a district court, a marshal, and all of the other clerks and employees of the court already in existence there. The only effect of the passage of this bill will be the appointment of the additional judge.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? I need not say anything further, except to say that in answer to the question the Senator from Tennessee has given correct data. The bills do not create, nor intend nor propose to create, any additional marshals, clerks, or district attorneys.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And they create no new districts.

Mr. ASHURST. They create no new districts and no new officials except the judges—no new marshals, no new district attorneys, no new clerks.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the courts are already existing. The courthouse, the place of meeting of the court, is already in existence, and there will be no additional expense on account of it except for the judge.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The purpose I had in asking the question was to ascertain whether these things would not naturally follow.

Mr. President, with that assurance I shall vote for the amendment, because from the showing made it seems to be a needed addition to the bill, but not with any intention of voting for the bill in its present form.

Mr. ASHURST. No, Mr. President, because, as has been stated, no new place, no new machinery, is proposed to be created; simply an additional judge.

Mr. McKELLAR. All the rest is in existence now. They have all the rest; it is just simply a judge from another district who sits in the court.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I confess that I am always partial to any proposition that is put forward by my friend from Arizona. I believe I have always voted for every proposition he has presented to the Senate before this. I think he is always right on his fundamentals, and I have no doubt they need a new judge in Arizona, and I am glad the Senate has passed a bill providing for that; but we are interested in a bill to increase the salaries of the Federal judges throughout the United States and the Territories. I am afraid it would defeat the bill if this amendment were adopted, and in spite of my entire sympathy with the vigilant and intelligent Senator from Arizona on this very proposition, I feel obliged to vote against the amendment, and I hope it will fail.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think I have supported in the Judiciary Committee all but one of these bills, and I was absent from the Judiciary Committee when that one was favorably acted upon. I think they are all right; but we passed upon each one separately, and the House is entitled to investigate each one of them separately, and pass upon it separately.

I am afraid that the adoption of this amendment would seriously endanger this bill, and for that reason I shall vote against it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the members of the committee how the bill can be endangered. It has to go to conference; and if there is danger of the defeat of the bill, that matter can be settled in conference. There is no reason why the Senate should not express its opinion on the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course, if the Senate does not expect the conferees to stand out for this amendment, it would do no harm; but if we are going to go to conference and really insist upon it, I have not any real hope that the House would accept it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is mistaken in that. I think there will be a real hope of the House accepting the amendment. Their committees have passed upon all these bills favorably, and I do not see how it could possibly endanger the bills in any way whatsoever.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator thinks, then, that the House would accept the amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I shall vote against it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, knowing as I do something of the situation in the other body with reference to some of the bills that are included in this amendment, I feel that I ought to say that, in my judgment, if this amendment is adopted it will very seriously endanger the passage of this bill. There has always been a very considerable opposition in the other body to any increase at all in the salaries of Federal judges; and, in my judgment, if this amendment is adopted, even though it may be agreed upon by the conferees, the House will reject the conference report and the entire legislation will fail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

Mr. ASHURST. I respectfully request the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], which I transfer to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MARTIN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HENDERSON (when Mr. PHELAN'S name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] on account of illness. If present he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. He is not present, and not knowing how he would vote I will withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote, and therefore I vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] are detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

So Mr. ASHURST'S amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. TRAMMELL and Mr. NUGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate five minutes. I simply desire to enter my protest against the passage of this bill. We have passed through a terrible war, and the resources of the country are taxed to the utmost. The cost of living has gone up so that almost every salaried man in the United States feels the trouble. In the distress which prevails, which has been brought about by the war, it does seem to me most unfortunate to undertake now to increase salaries.

But, Mr. President, if we are to increase salaries in the United States I appeal to Senators to begin at the bottom. There are people, as we all know, in this city and throughout the United States in the employment of the United States Government who find it almost impossible to get food and raiment with the salaries now paid them by the Government. They have all been appealing to the Congress for increases in salaries. The appeals come to me every day, and they are most touching in many instances. With due regard for the true interest of the entire country, I have been compelled, with rare exceptions, to turn a deaf ear to those appeals, but nobody will rise here in his seat and say that the judges of the United States are in any trouble about getting food and raiment with the salaries that are being paid them.

The judicial offices of the United States are more sought after, more desired, and more valuable than any other offices in the gift of the American people. There are few Members of Congress who would not resign the seat they hold to get a judicial appointment under the Federal Government. We have had many instances in recent years where able men in Congress have resigned to accept judicial appointments under the Federal Government. I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that the judicial offices of the United States are the most valuable, the most desirable, the most sought after that the Government can bestow upon any of its citizens.

In the name of reason, Senators, if you are going to increase salaries, is it right to begin at the top? You have not heard of any of the Federal judges resigning because the pay was not big enough, and you are not likely to do so. In my own State the judges of the supreme court get $4,500 a year. They are very able men. There is hardly one of them who would not be an ornament to the Supreme Court of the United States, and they are working for $4,500 a year, and do more work, in my opinion, than the average judge of a Federal court. In my own State I know the judges of our supreme court do many times the work that is done by the district and circuit judges.

I believe in a well-paid judiciary; if circumstances permitted, I would be willing to see their salaries increased, but I feel that they are the best-paid men in the employment of the United States Government, without a single exception, and it is a position more sought after than any other position that can be bestowed by the Government of the United States.

If we are going to increase salaries, is it right to commence with those who are most favored now by the Government, who do not know what the pinch of want is, who can enjoy every luxury, every comfort, and every pleasure without any serious difficulty? Do you not think we had better commence with those people who are feeling the sting of want, who find it difficult to live on the meager salaries now paid them by the Government of the United States?

I am amazed that the Senate of the United States should be disposed to add to the salaries of the most favored class of people in the United States, without a single exception, and that is what this bill does. I am absolutely opposed to commencing at the top. If we are going to raise salaries, in God's name let us begin at the bottom and begin where there is real want. Let us begin where there is real necessity for an increase and not begin by piling up additional salaries for the best-paid officials that the Government of the United States employs.

That is all I desire to say, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the clarion voice of the Senator from Virginia, who happens at the same time to be the leader of the Democratic Party upon this floor, in such unmistakable terms as I have just heard. The excuse made for all this is the increase in the cost of living. Do Senators forget that the increase in the cost of living bears chiefly upon the taxpayer and not upon the Federal judge, not upon a Senator or Representative in Congress or governor? The increased cost of living renders the taxpayer less able to pay taxes, and war emergencies and the peace reconstruction emergencies render it all the more necessary that he should pay taxes. This is the time of all times that is the wrong time, and yet the time of all times when everybody comes up wanting to pull at the breast of the Treasury of the country in order to get something added to what he hitherto has been receiving.

The Senator from Virginia is exactly right. This bill with these provisions in it ought not to pass this body. This body can not go before the American people with a feeble increase of 10 per cent for the people who are getting $780 and $900 a year while it grants these increases to the men who are receiving not only enough to get food and raiment, as the Senator from Virginia says, but, in addition, sufficient to educate their children. When King Henry IV entered the capital of France he said that he wanted to see the day come when every peasant in France should have a fowl in his pot. The utmost any man looks for in this world is the day when everybody can buy food and raiment and educate his children in a respectable way.

Why should you increase the immense financial distances between men? There is not a man in the United States who would not rather be a Federal judge at $3,000 a year than to be a hod carrier at $6,000, if the hod carrier could get $6,000.

This is not demagogy. I do not think I have ever been a demagogue; I do not think I could be if I tried to cultivate the art. But you all know that men's compensation for their work in this world consists partly in money and partly in honor. Would I, for example, have been a Senator of the United States for the sake of the salary? A whole lot of you never would have been, although the salary was a big thing to me. What appealed to you to come here? It was the idea that your children and your children's children might point to the record and say you had been here in this august body representing a part of the legislative authority of this United States. A man takes pride in the fact that from the Continental Congress down to the present time his family has been represented upon the floor of the legislative body of the United States. Could you get any better men if you paid them $20,000 a year than you are getting now? No; you would get worse men. You would get men who would come here for the money, and the man who goes anywhere in the front line of battle or in the ranks of honor in this world for money is a bad representative of the American people.

You can not build up a good judiciary of men whose chief aspiration is an increase in salary. If that is a man's chief wish, then he ought to get off the bench at once and go to making money somewhere else without the honor. But if he prefers honor to money, he will stay where he is. If he prefers money to honor, he will resign, as so many have done from the State benches and some few from the Federal benches.

I tell you this whole idea that you can create ability by paying in cash is a lie. You could not have created John Marshall by giving him $20,000 a year, nor Judge Story, nor Chancellor Kent, nor Chief Justice Sharkey, of the State of Mississippi. There was not a day in the life of either one of those men when they would not rather have had the office with just enough to furnish them food and raiment than not to have had it at all. It was an honor to them, an honor to their children, an honor to their grandchildren, and an honor to their family all the time. The true aristocracy of the world consists in being able to point back to ancestors who performed public service. These Federal judges are members of the American aristocracy, as is every man who performs a high public service.

It is just as foolish to tell me you can get better judges by paying more money as it is to tell me you can get better Senators by paying more money. You would merely tempt every selfish moneygrubber in the world to run for the Senate, whether he was fit for it or not. If you pay him more money than he could make in his present occupation, he would give up that occupation because he could make more money by holding a seat in the United States Senate. You do not want to tempt men to public service merely with money. You want to give them enough money to carry off the dignity of the situation, and it does not require so awfully much dignity. You want to give them enough money so that out of the salary they can carry themselves and their families respectably in society. But it does not take so awfully much money to do that. John Marshall used to carry his paper parcels through the streets of the city and never considered it a disgrace. Such a thing would be considered a great disgrace in these days; at least it is in many cities, and I suppose it is here. As to carrying a basket or parcel with fish and chickens and oysters in it for the family to eat, that is beneath the dignity of any man now serving in a public place anywhere. He would rather be shot at than be seen performing that duty on the public streets. You can not create legal ability by paying cash for it. It has got to be there; and then, if it chooses to exploit itself as a lawyer, it can sell itself for cash, but you can not create it by giving it cash. How do you create judges? If you create them right, you find a man who has made the best lawyer in his district and you try to make a judge of him. He did not make the best lawyer in his district because some one had paid him money. Let me give you an example. I have gone out of the back door many a day to escape a client coming in the front door, because the practice of law bored me and the money did not interest me. It did, too; but I mean it did not interest me sufficiently to make me stay in.

Here is another man who loves the law. Take the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], for example. He loves a law point as I love a logical syllogism or a mathematical problem. It does not bore him; it interests him. The consequence has been that he has made a great lawyer. Do you suppose, if you were going to put him on the bench to-day, you could make him any better lawyer by giving him $10,000 a year instead of $7,500? I imagine you would make a worse lawyer of him, for you might give him a whole lot of luxurious habits that he now has not, and the luxury might lead to laziness, and laziness might lead to intellectual indolence, and intellectual indolence might finally lead to legal inefficiency. I am glad that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] made that little talk. It was the best thing I have heard in this Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I trust I have a sufficient and proper appreciation of the position of the judiciary in our Federal system. I have many times on this floor and elsewhere expressed my views in regard to it, and I have not in any sense modified those views. I also realize that all of the Federal judiciary is insufficiently paid, but I do not believe that it is so insufficiently paid as to justify this bill at this time, when we take into consideration the conditions which now confront us. I realize, of course, that there are men upon the bench who are making a sacrifice, who are not receiving what they would receive if they were in private practice; but if there is anyone in this country who is not making a sacrifice now in a financial way, I do not know who it is.

Business is embarrassed and business men are embarrassed; business men are suffering and business men will go to the wall, owing to the exceedingly great burden which has necessarily been laid upon us by reason of this war; and I do not believe that the Federal judiciary ought to be singled out and have their salaries increased, and I do not believe that the judges of the Federal judiciary, as a whole, expect it. I think that the great body of them are perfectly willing to submit to the situation which now confronts them until they, in common with all their countrymen, can enjoy a better condition of affairs.

I do not see, Mr. President, how it is possible for us to raise these salaries without raising salaries all along the line below these. I do not see what possible answer we can make to the requests which will come to us to raise salaries below this amount, for it comes right down to the question of what is necessary to sustain life and to clothe and to feed a family. There are any number of men in this country who are now serving the public at very much lower salaries than are being paid to the Federal judiciary, and if it is a question of living, if it is a question of clothing and of food and of the education of the family, what possible answer can we make to these men when they ask for an increase of salary and point to the fact that we have increased the salaries of judges?

You are greatly in error, Senators, if you suppose that the request will not come. It will be here upon short notice; it is here now in a potential way, and we must face it. Are we in a position, therefore, to set the precedent and to establish the example of increasing salaries at this particular time, when everyone is sorely pressed by reason of financial conditions and by reason of heavy taxes? I do not think that we ought to do it, though I have just as high an appreciation of the Federal judiciary, I presume, as anyone could have, and I have just as high an appreciation of the character of the judges who occupy these places. I believe they are willing, and I believe they ought to be, to suffer with the rest until a better condition of affairs arises.

I have been in the Senate, Mr. President, for nearly 12 years. One of the first activities in which I was engaged in the Senate was in opposition to the raising of salaries. I have watched the program ever since. If we raise the salary of a class of officers to-day, to-morrow they point with full justification to the fact that that salary is unfair as compared with the salaries which we are paying to others, and there is no answer to it. Every man wants to be equitable; every man wants to be fair; and when some employees point to the fact that we have raised salaries here and there, and we refuse to raise their salaries, it is an argument which a Senator can not answer. The result of it is that this becomes a law of perpetual motion, and we are constantly increasing salaries regardless of circumstances and conditions which confront us. When employees come here with their $1,200, $1,500, $2,000, and $3,000 a year salaries and ask for an increase, and say, "We can not live on what we are now getting," what answer will we make when we have raised the salaries of those now receiving $6,000 and $7,000 because the officers receiving those salaries can not live upon them?

So, Mr. President, we are entering at this critical time, when people are being taxed beyond any conception of previous years, upon a program of raising salaries all along the line, if we are going to do justice to the entire situation. I know that the Federal judiciary is able; I know that it is patriotic; I know that it is devoted to the interests of this country; I know the judges are men of character and they will understand the situation. We should not ask that this precedent be established at this particular juncture of critical affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate very briefly in saying a few words with reference to this bill. The district and circuit court judges of the United States are receiving the same salaries they have received for many years. Instead of this bill being a precedent for raising salaries, the precedent all along the line is that the salaries of others in similar positions have been raised, while the salaries of these officers have not. The salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States have been raised; the salaries of Cabinet officers have been raised; the salaries of assistant attorneys in the Department of Justice have been increased; and, all around, men engaged in the same class of work have had their salaries increased, while the Federal judges have not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator might also include Members of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and, as the Senator says, Members of Congress have had their salaries increased.

Mr. President, I am not generally in favor of increasing salaries; I believe in economy; but there is no class of men in the United States who carry more completely the lives, the liberties, and the property of the people than do our Federal judges. They are of the utmost importance to the people of this country. I believe that a United States court judge should be separated from the ordinary affairs of life even more than a Representative or a Senator, more than a Cabinet officer, more than a district attorney, or an assistant district attorney. The Federal judge can not practice law, no; he can not engage in business, no; he can not engage in trade, no; he can not form business associations without complicating his relations to the litigants in his court. He is put in the position where he must lay the making of money behind him and rely solely on his salary and such little savings as he may make from his salary and invest.

For a number of years past there has been a recognized view that the salaries of Federal judges ought to be increased, but no general plan was adopted. The Judiciary Committee of the House worked out with great care a plan and the House finally adopted one embodying an increase, but not an extravagant one. We were on the point in the Senate of doubling the increase given by the House; but, I am glad to say, this morning the Senate reconsidered its action and went back to the conservative figures given us by the House of Representatives. There was a very close vote in the House as to whether $7,500 and $8,500 or $8,000 and $9,000 should be the figures; but the almost overwhelming sentiment was that some increase was essential, and this bill finally passed by an overwhelming majority.

There are two other provisions in the bill of substantial importance. We have had district and circuit judges under our present system who passed the age of 70, but did not retire, because they felt that they were able to do something and that retirement and abandonment of all work meant mental and physical collapse. In this bill they are given the opportunity to retire, not to resign, but to continue to serve in judicial life to the extent of their physical capacity. I think that is a most valuable provision.

The bill also provides that if any judge, on account of physical or mental disability of a permanent character, can not perform efficiently all the duties of the office, then the President can appoint an additional judge. We have been embarrassed by this condition frequently heretofore, and this part of the bill perfects, in my opinion, our judicial system.

I trust that, as we have reached such progress in this proposed legislation, it will receive the indorsement of the Senate; and I submit the matter, so far as I am concerned, to your consideration.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I trust that I have sufficient respect for the dignity of the courts of the United States, and I do not presume to speak for any State save my own, but I realize that we are about to establish a precedent here that will be troublesome to the Senate in the future, and not the remote future—not next week or next year—but right now. We have selected a body of public servants who are receiving reasonable salaries, who are to-day receiving sufficient to care for themselves and their families and to educate their children, and are ignoring a large number of public officials who are not receiving sufficient to take care of their families and themselves. I consider it, sir, an outrage to take men occupying high position in the Government, now receiving reasonable compensation, and increase their salaries unless we go the whole length of the line.

In my State we have never been troubled to find men to fill the office of district judge, and I am frank to say, sir, that we have not a lawyer, to my knowledge, in the State of Maine who would not be glad to receive such an appointment to-day and now. I assume that the same condition exists all over New England and, perhaps, all over these United States.

I am opposed to this proposition. Now is a most inopportune time to begin to advance the salaries of high-paid officials. If we must begin, let us begin at the other end of the line. There is not a Senator here, I assume, who is not making some sacrifice. I know of many Senators on this floor who have left salaries much higher than they are receiving here in order that they may have the honor of a position in the United States Senate.

I am very much opposed to this proposition beginning at this end of the line. I can not understand by what legerdemain these officials have been selected, unless we go the whole length and increase the salaries of every other public official. I am of the firm conviction that there are many public officials who ought to have their salaries increased, who are receiving from $1,600 to $2,000, which is entirely inadequate to support their families; but if any class of people are to receive an increase in salaries, such increase should begin in a different class than those covered by this bill; and I wish to register my protest, as a business man and as a Senator from Maine, against this proposed increase.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have never been an advocate of high salaries when applied to what we ordinarily term "salaries," but I think I can show a consistent record in favor of the advocacy of pretty liberal wages to be paid to wage earners; but there have been some things said in opposition to this bill which lead me to ask the attention of the Senate for a few minutes.

In the first place, it is said that a good salary will not make a poor judge a good judge. Everybody in the world knows that. The statement was made that a good salary would not make a poor lawyer a good lawyer. The Senate of the United States did not need to be informed of that fact; but it is nevertheless true that, taken first and last, salaries have something to do with the question of whether good lawyers can be induced to leave their practices and devote their lives to the bench. Salaries may become so meager that the bench suffers in the quality of its membership, or if it does not suffer the occupants of the bench are put to disadvantages that are unfair.

My friend from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]—who, I am sorry to see, has left the Chamber, and who is a business man—states that he can not see any business sense in this proposition to raise the salaries of Federal judges. If this were a business proposition pure and simple, we would not get the men who are on the Federal bench to serve for two or three times their salaries. This is not a business proposition. It is a proposition of what is fair and right and just and what is best for the people of the United States.

To begin with, no man ever ought to be appointed to the Federal bench unless he is a ripe and seasoned lawyer, a man who enjoys and who has been enjoying a large practice, because the only way we can really test out the ability of a lawyer to be a good judge is by his record made for many years in the courts of the land. If a man is an experienced lawyer and an able lawyer and a lawyer with a large practice, then when he enters upon the duties of the Federal bench he must make a very large financial sacrifice, for there are very few lawyers engaged in good practice in the cities of the land to-day who possess the abilities which ought to go upon the Federal bench but who are making a great deal more money than the salaries proposed. Indeed, they frequently make more money in one case than the salaries proposed.

So much for that phase of the question. There is another phase of it.

It of course is true that there are men who have such high regard for the judicial honor that they will make very great financial sacrifices and subject themselves to many great hardships in order to hold such a position; but I believe it to be true that, first and last, taking the whole question and looking at the years together, it will be found that the character of the new appointees upon the Federal bench will begin to disintegrate if we place the salary of a judge at a point where the occupant of the bench can not support his family, educate his family, and have a little money left for his wife and children to live upon when he ceases to occupy the bench.

If the salaries which are now paid were just salaries at the time they were fixed, then the proposed salary is certainly not excessive at this time, because the value of a dollar then was fully twice the value of a dollar to-day. Its purchasing power was fully twice as great at the time these salaries were fixed as that purchasing power is to-day. These Federal courts are becoming more and more important. Their jurisdiction has been vastly enlarged. Their influence upon the national life, because of this enlarged jurisdiction, is much greater than it was a few years ago; and in deciding this question nothing of the demagogic argument ought to considered. Justice should be done to the occupants of these high positions, and only justice.

Mr. President, I have in mind a case which perhaps may have influenced my judgment a good deal. A few months ago I got a $1,200 clerkship for the widow of a man who for nearly 20 years sat upon the supreme bench of one of the great Central States of the Union. He was paid a salary of $5,000. He was expected to maintain a respectable home and to perform those duties—social, public, or otherwise—which fall upon a judge; and they are many. He lived moderately, he had no bad habits, but he kept up the sort of a home which the people would like to have one of the justices of their supreme court keep up, and his little wife spent money moderately; and yet at the end of the year the $5,000 was gone. It does not go very far when men have to live on a certain plane; and this man, who served his State with distinction and was one of the greatest of the judges of that State, who practically devoted his life to public service—all the ripe years of his life—when he could have made from $50,000 to $100,000 a year in his practice, died and left his widow practically without anything. He had expended money in educating some children, which had been a heavy draft upon him; and his widow is here in Washington working for $1,200 a year at a position that she is not physically capable of holding.

It is all right to talk about sacrifice, and it is all right to talk about economy; but you can go too far in your cry for economy, and you can demand sacrifices to such an extent that you become unjust; you may injure the fiber and character of the men who will hereafter be appointed to these great positions. There are not many of them in the United States, after all. The draft upon the Public Treasury through this will not be great.

We are told that we are about to pass a bill appropriating $100,000,000 to be expended in foreign lands in charitable acts among people whom we do not even know, and we do not even know in what nations and countries it is to be expended. The interest on that $100,000,000, at the rate the United States has to pay, would be $4,500,000 a year. It would many times over pay these salaries and pay this increase. We shall probably pass that bill. I do not urge that as an argument, further than to call your attention to the fact that sometimes we open the bunghole with great liberality and at the same time put our thumb upon the spigot with a great deal of parsimony.

Mr. President, I believe that this bill as now drawn is a fair bill. I believe it ought to be passed. It is a poor time to demagogue a case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think there is one suggestion that ought to be made here before the vote is cast upon this bill, and that is this, and it is simply in addition to the reasons that have been given against the raising of the judges' salaries:

First, in the Swayne trial here it was demonstrated that 50 per cent of the judges of the United States courts charged considerably more than the law actually allowed them when sitting in courts other than at their places of residence. For instance, the law provides that when a judge of a Federal court is called to sit in another court away from his home place or his own district he may charge as expenses the actual expenses, not exceeding $10 per day. In that case the fact developed that more than 50 per cent, as I remember, put in all their bills for $10 a day expenses, even though they might not have been more than three or four dollars per day; and there is considerable of this transferring from one point to another done in the country. I do not know whether or not that system is followed now as it was then, but I think it is. I know that it is followed in some courts, because I have looked over the reports that have been sent in, and have been informed that they have followed the rule, no matter what the expenses were, of charging $10 per day; so whatever profit of that kind there may be is in addition to their salary.

That is not the only way in which the judges have been favored. In the present revenue bill we relieve judges of the Federal courts of any payment of taxes whatever upon their salaries. Senators must pay their proportion of the taxes according to their incomes, whether upon their salaries alone or salaries combined with incomes from outside sources; but no judge of a Federal court, Supreme or district court, is compelled to pay one penny of taxes under the bill as it is now in conference, and, of course, there will be no change in that respect. It may not amount to more than $400 a year, but that is something of an addition, while everyone else must pay his full taxes. I have never agreed, and I do not agree to-day, with the constitutional objection that is urged that these salaries are not taxable, because I think they are taxable as income, and I have never agreed to the doctrine that levying a tax upon the salary of either the President or a Federal judge was diminishing his income during his incumbency in office.

Take into consideration, also, the fact that after reaching the age of 70 years the ordinary individual must still perform services for the support of his family, while the judge, after having reached that age, may withdraw from any work and his salary will go on during life.

Taking into consideration all of these matters, Mr. President, it does seem to me that it is decidedly unjust to the taxpayer, who must go down into his own pockets to meet these additional salaries, to ask him to pay not only the taxes from which you relieve the judges, but, in addition to that, to increase their salaries beyond what they are at the present time, which amount shall also be nontaxable.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, it was suggested by the Senator in charge of the bill a short time ago that the salaries of others had been increased, including judges of the Supreme Court and other officials in high positions, and that these officers have not received any increase in salary. I may be mistaken, but I have a very distinct recollection that Congress has increased the salaries of these judges within the last 15 years. As I say, I may be mistaken in that, but I do not think I am; but, be that as it may, I do not believe that this is the time to increase these salaries. In normal times and under normal conditions I would vote for an increase in these salaries. But this is the time when everybody is called upon to make sacrifices; everybody is compelled to do it. I am sure that the judges of these courts will not object, in fact I am certain they will be glad to do their part in bearing the burden which this country must bear at this time as a result of the war.

As has been suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], they have a life position. Not only that, but after service of a certain length of time or when they reach a certain age—and it is not a very great age either—they can retire and continue to draw the salary which the law has provided. Many of them prefer to stay on the bench and render service for the Government, but they are not compelled to do so. They do not have to worry anything about the future, so far as ample provision for a comfortable living is concerned, for themselves and their families. That is a very important thing. I have no doubt it appeals to a great many when positions of this kind are to be filled.

Mr. President, we are having demands presented to the Government for increases of salaries upon the part of almost all the employees of the Government. There are a great many employees of the Government who, in my judgment, are not even reasonably well paid. There are employees in the District of Columbia who have appealed and are appealing to Congress for increases in their salaries. It is true they do not hold the high and responsible positions which these judges hold, but they are entitled to the reasonable comforts of life; they are entitled to have reasonably warm and reasonably good clothing; they are entitled to have a reasonable supply of food; and yet it is really a wonder to me, though it may not be to anybody else, how many of these people actually exist upon the salaries which they get.

If we are going to begin increasing salaries, I think we ought to begin where it is most needed; that is, where the actual necessities of existence require and demand it. If there were anything which at this time under these present conditions would induce me to vote for the passage of this bill, it would be that I would vote for it in the hope that if the Senate did pass it when these other requests came up it could not reject them or refuse them.

We provided an increase during the past year, under conditions everybody is familiar with, of $120 a year. It is common knowledge that it is proposed to continue this increase for another year and hold down other increases of salary. Of course, Mr. President, that is something, but it is not much. It is suggested here that the purchasing power of the dollar which is paid to these judges is not worth more than 50 per cent of what it was when they were appointed and when the salary was fixed. Grant that, Mr. President. The purchasing power of the dollar of the school-teacher in the District of Columbia who gets $750 a year is no greater than the purchasing power of the dollar which any judge or any other official receives. We do not propose to increase the salaries of the school-teachers—at least there does not seem to be very much prospect of it—and until we can take care of the actual necessities of those in the Government employ whose salary is not really sufficient to furnish them with the actual necessities and comforts of life I can not get the consent of my judgment to vote to increase the salaries of men who are now receiving that which certainly brings them a comfortable living and assures them a comfortable living during their entire lifetime.

I freely concede the important duties which these judges must perform and the responsibilities of the positions which they occupy, as well as the high standing, character, and ability which they should have, and I think it is entirely out of place to suggest in this argument that there is any Senator who does not appreciate that. We know that we want judges of the highest integrity and of the highest ability, but there is no suggestion here, there is no charge here that we have not that kind of a judiciary now.

It was suggested a moment ago that the judiciary might deteriorate. There is no charge that it is deteriorating.

These salaries have been in existence quite a good many years, and we have practically completed the war; it is practically over, and we hope that in the no distant future conditions will become normal. There has not been thus far any complaint; in fact, I have not heard any complaint by these judges, and as has already been said I do not think they would make any complaint. They are not asking for this increase now. In my judgment it really is an insult to them for us to propose to urge this increase under present conditions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A committee for the judges presented the matter very fully before the House Judiciary Committee, and the evidence is printed showing the necessity, as they see it, of these increases.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am sorry to know that the judges have been working for this increase of salary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not say that they have been working for it, and I hope the Senator will not oppose the bill on that ground.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the judges have not done this. I hope I would have no justification to oppose it on that ground. I did not know they had sent a committee here to urge it. I am sorry if they have. I think that is one of the most reprehensible things that the judiciary could do, and I am satisfied that if that committee came here for the purpose of lobbying for this bill it does not reflect the sentiment, sense of propriety, and the patriotism of the great mass of the judiciary of this country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say a committee of judges was sent here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Perhaps some of the judges were called, but the committee was a committee of the Bar Association. There was evidence, I think, from the judges, however, as to their financial condition and their expenses.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That makes it a little better. Of course, I knew that some of the Bar Association were urging this legislation. I am sorry they have done so at this time, but I am glad that the judiciary is exonerated from it. I hope that none of the judges have been down here talking to anybody with reference to an increase of salary during these times. I hope there is not a single judge occupying the bench who could so forget the real requirements of his position as to come to Congress or induce anybody to come to Congress to urge the increase of his salary at this time and under these conditions. I hope no judge has tacitly or openly approved the appearance here of any committee on his behalf. I wish they had openly opposed this bill at this time. They would be more highly thought of by the people had they done so.

As I said, I do not believe that the judiciary of the country would indorse anything of this kind or encourage anything of the kind.

I believe they would, in fact, repudiate it if it were brought to their attention. It may be that committees from bar associations and attorneys have come urging it. To do so, in my judgment, places the judiciary in a false light. They are just as patriotic men as there are in the country. They are just as loyal men as we have in the country. They are of the highest character, and they recognize the conditions that confront the people of this country. They are perfectly willing to bear their burdens in this hour of stress and trial. In my judgment they do not ask for this increased salary. They do not seek it, and we are but reflecting upon them when, in the face of all the demands from others throughout the country who need it much more, we propose to increase their salaries and not take care of those who are actually suffering for the necessities and comforts of life.

We fear Bolshevikism. We are warned against its growth and development, and ways and means are sought to stop it. Mr. President, things like this promote and foster Bolshevikism more than anything else in this or any other country. You will never stop the growth of Bolshevikism till you destroy the sense of injustice and discrimination that acts like this arouse.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know whether it is possible at this parliamentary stage of the bill to move to srike out sections 2 and 3—I think they are—to strike out the sections increasing the salaries of the present judges?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). The present occupant of the chair thinks, the bill having been read the third time and being on its passage, it is not open to amendment at this stage.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was of that view myself, but I did not know whether it was the opinion of the Chair or not. I wish simply to say, then, that I am sorry the bill has reached this parliamentary stage. If a vote is taken on the bill as it now stands, I shall vote against it. I am not going to enter into a discussion at any length as to the reasons why, but I have been giving some little attention, in the last few days especially, to this question of the increase of wages. I am a member of a subcommittee that has under consideration now a bill to fix a minimum wage of $3 a day for Federal employees. Whether such a bill shall become a law or not of course I can not say, but I am greatly impressed with the necessity for some relief to those who receive only small compensation. If anything is to be done in that direction, I agree with various Senators who have expressed their views upon this bill that that is the place to begin.

I do not believe that we should increase these salaries now, and if the bill comes to a vote as it is now presented to the Senate I shall vote against it.

There are other provisions in the bill which seem to me to be very meritorious. The other provisions in the bill I have given some attention to for several years. In various districts in the United States there are conditions existing which will require and the public business demands that there shall be some relief, and such relief would be given by the other provisions of the bill. I would like very much to see those provisions become law. But if the question is put up to me whether I shall accept the bill as a whole or not, I shall vote against it. I do not know whether the Senator in charge of the bill desires to put it back into a parliamentary stage where the sole question of an increase in salaries shall be the issue or not, but in the present situation I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I find myself in somewhat of an embarrassing position with reference to this bill. As a matter of fact, I have not only expected to vote for it but I have said in more than one instance that I intended to do so. I did fully expect to do so until within the last very few days.

I believe, as has been very well said by a number of Senators who favored this measure during the discussion of it, that the Federal judiciary is as a class underpaid. I think it has performed very great service for the country in the last few years, that we are beholden to it for great things in the not very distant past, and that we must look to it for perhaps still greater things in the days that are to come. I think the hope of this country lies very largely with the Federal judiciary. I believe that the salaries attached to it should be commensurate with the character and services and the position at the bar of the men who are going to occupy those places. I believe that none but the best of the profession should be appointed to the Federal bench, and as a rule I think that practice has been followed by the Presidents of both parties who have been charged with the responsibility of making these appointments.

As I said at the outset, I believe that as a class the Federal judges are underpaid. When I contemplate the situation in my own State and think of the man who occupies the Federal district bench there I am very sure that that is the case. He is a man who could earn several times in the practice of the law the salary he is now receiving as a judge of the Federal court. But financially he is a poor man, comparatively speaking, and he is making a great pecuniary sacrifice in staying where he is. I have recognized that fact. I realize if that is the case with him it is probably the case with many others.

But, Mr. President, within the last few days I have been impressed with the demands and the righteousness and justice of the demands that are made upon all of us here by many other classes of Federal employees. For instance, of the clerks and secretaries who represent the Senators in this body there is not one who is not underpaid, in so far as the Government is concerned. Every one of us knows that. There is more than one Senator on this floor who goes down into his private pocket, those who are happily able to do so, to piece out the inadequate salaries that are paid to those efficient secretaries and clerks by the Government of the United States.

We have increased the salaries of some by a pittance and only a pittance, and they are living here from hand to mouth, so to speak. Two girls came to my office yesterday afternoon who work in the Library here. They were respectable, nice-looking girls. One of them is receiving a salary of $50 a month, the other a salary of $60 a month. How they live here now in the city of Washington respectably, as their appearance indicated they certainly do, is just a little beyond my comprehension. I do not know how it is possible for them to do it.

Let me add, I have here on my desk a request in behalf of the Federal food and drug inspectors of the United States, something that has just been handed me. They want an increase of salary. I have letters this morning from half a dozen classes of public employees, post-office clerks, letter carriers, rural-route carriers, all asking for an increase, and so far as my opinion goes they are all of them deserving of it. The high cost of living and all that sort of thing has borne down most heavily upon the salaried men and women to-day. There has been no opportunity to increase their income, and their expenses have been added to to such an extent that it is most burdensome and oppressive, and I do not see how they get along at all. The whole business public is protesting against the enormous burden of taxation we are now inflicting upon them, and there is a general demand for conservatism in expenditures, and there is great reason for it. We can not reduce expenditures by raising salaries.

So, Mr. President, it becomes to my mind not a question of the deserts or merits of the case with reference to the Federal judiciary but the opportuneness of this request. At another time I would not only be willing to vote to increase the salaries of the Federal judiciary, but I would gladly do so. At this moment, Mr. President, I hesitate to do it, and I shall decline to do so solely because I feel that the time for it is inopportune.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. KING, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. BRANDEGEE, and Mr. COLT conferees upon the part of the Senate.

CONVEYANCE OF LAND TO PRINCETON, IND.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10663) to convey a strip of land on the site of the Federal building at Princeton, Ind. I should like to say merely that this is a bill which it will not take one moment to consider. The bill is purely local in its character, and is to enable the city of Princeton, Ind., to open an alley in the rear of the post office. The passage of the bill is desired by the Government as well as by the city of Princeton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey, by quit-claim deed, to the city of Princeton, Ind., for the purpose of a public alley, and for no other purpose, all the right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to a strip of land off the rear of the Federal building site in that city 5 feet in width to provide, in connection with land adjacent thereto, a 10-foot alley, and provides that the city of Princeton shall open the alley and improve and maintain it as other public alleys of the city are improved and maintained.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 13708, making an appropriation for food relief in Europe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 13708. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON. What is the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a bill proposing to appropriate $100,000,000 for food for the suffering people in the famine districts of Europe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not intend to interpose an objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia. I anticipate, however, that it will, perhaps, take a little time to dispose of the measure which he has in mind, and I was about to ask recognition of the Chair—in fact, I did rise when the Senator from Virginia rose—that I might ask unanimous consent to have taken up for consideration House joint resolution 289, which I am certain can be passed in one or two minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield for that purpose.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 289) for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments on page 1, line 3, after the word "That," to strike out the name "M. T. Dwyer" and to insert "George S. Wood"; and at the beginning of line 5 to strike out the name "Henry Hase" and to insert "Menander Dennett," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That George S. Wood, of Ohio; James S. Catherwood, of Illinois; John C. Nelson, of Indiana; and Menander Dennett, of Wisconsin, be, and they are hereby, appointed members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States, to succeed George H. Wood, of Ohio; James S. Catherwood, of Illinois; John C. Nelson, of Indiana; and John W. West, of Maine, whose terms of office expired April 21, 1918.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, one error has been made in the printing of the joint resolution, and I therefore move, in line 5, to strike out the name "Wisconsin" and to insert "Maine."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia obtained the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	McLean	Shafroth
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Martin, Ky.	Sheppard
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Culberson	Kellogg	Myers	Swanson
Cummins	Kenyon	Nelson	Thomas
Curtis	King	Nugent	Townsend
Fletcher	Kirby	Overman	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Page	Underwood
Gay	La Follette	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Henderson	Lenroot	Pollock	Watson
Hitchcock	Lodge	Pomerene	Williams
Hollis	McCumber	Saulsbury

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on account of illness, and will ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. MCNARY] on account of official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators only have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. LEWIS, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, and Mr. WARREN answered to their names when called.

Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. NEW, and Mr. SUTHERLAND entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I renew my request for unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13708.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13708. Is there objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13708, notwithstanding the objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary; which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments on page 2, line 2, after the word "audited," to strike out the words "where practicable"; in line 3, after the word "Government," to strike out the words "are audited"; in line 7, after the word "receipts," to strike out the word "and"; and in the same line, after the word "expenditures," to insert "and an itemized statement for which expended," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the participation by the Government of the United States in the furnishing of foodstuffs and other urgent supplies, and for the transportation, distribution, and administration thereof to such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President from time to time as necessary, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, in the discretion of the President, there is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $100,000,000, which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1919, and which shall be audited in the same manner as other expenditures of the Government: Provided, That expenditures hereunder shall be reimbursed so far as possible by the Governments or subdivisions thereof or the peoples to whom relief is furnished: Provided further, That a report of the receipts, expenditures, and an itemized statement for which expended under this appropriation shall be submitted to Congress not later than the first day of the next regular session.

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. KENYON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington first addressed the Chair.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was simply going to say that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] I know is very much interested in this measure. I sent for him awhile ago, but he is not here. I had supposed there would be some discussion of the measure.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator from Washington that there will be some discussion. I understood that the Senator from Virginia was going to explain the bill. I wish to make some few remarks against the bill, and I will make them now or after the Senator from Virginia concludes, as he may desire.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a rather late hour in the afternoon now, and my idea was not to consume any time unless it was absolutely necessary. I was under the impression that this matter was of such public notoriety and of such great importance that every Senator understood it, but, in view of the suggestion made, while I am not going into details, I will, in a very few words, explain the purposes of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Under what section of the Constitution does the Senator contend that Congress has authority to raise money by taxation and give it away, practically as a gift, to foreign peoples?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to go into a constitutional argument this afternoon on this matter.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will pardon me, if there is any section of the Constitution authorizing it, I should like to have it cited to me.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Similar action by the Government has been taken many, many times. I have a list of the precedents here.

Mr. MYERS. Where money has been appropriated to the people of foreign nations?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. To the people of foreign nations; yes.

Mr. MYERS. Have they not been loans to foreign nations?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No; they have been donations to relieve the sufferings of citizens of foreign nations.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to hear some of the precedents.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have a list here; it is a long one, but I will read a few of the precedents, although I confess that I can hardly see that, in the presence of the starvation of millions of our friends in European countries, the Senate will be very much interested in hearing a constitutional argument. I have no doubt about the constitutional power of Congress to afford relief to these sufferers, and I have no doubt that Congress will do it. As I have said, it has been done many, many times. The last time was in 1909, when $800,000 was appropriated to relieve the sufferings of destitute people in Italy. The act making that appropriation provided:

That to enable the President of the United States to procure and distribute among the suffering and destitute people of Italy such provisions, clothing, medicines, and other necessary articles, and to take such other steps as he shall deem advisable for the purpose of rescuing and succoring the people who are in peril and threatened with starvation, the sum of $800,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

In the execution of this act the President is requested to ask and obtain the approval of the Italian Government, and he is hereby authorized to employ any vessels of the United States Navy and to charter and employ any other suitable steamship or vessels.

That was the last precedent, having been made in 1909, appropriating $800,000, not to any government, but to relieve the suffering of destitute people in Italy.

The first precedent was in 1812, when $50,000 was appropriated for the relief of citizens of Venezuela who had suffered by an earthquake.

Again, in 1847, relief was given in an act from which I quote the following:

The Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to place at the disposal of Capt. George C. De Kay, of New Jersey, the U. S. S. Macedonian, for the purpose of transporting to the famishing poor of Ireland and Scotland such contributions as may be made for their relief.

Again in 1871, again in 1880, again in 1897, and again in 1898, in the case of Cuba, similar action was taken by Congress.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I notice that the bill, in line 7, refers to "populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany." Is it intended that the money or any part of it appropriated by this proposed act shall be used in feeding our enemies in Turkey, Bulgaria, and Austria-Hungary?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is not intended to use a dollar of this money for our enemies.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask in what countries it is to be used?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The President's first telegram states the countries in which it will be used; but it is distinctly understood that it is not to be used for the relief of our enemies. If any food goes to Germany, it will go there by their purchasing it, not by any donation from the United States. We make no provision for Germany or for German citizens in this bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President. I am very much opposed to the appropriation of a single dollar for anybody in Germany, Turkey, Bulgaria, or Austria-Hungary; and if the statement is made that they are hungry or that they are suffering, our reply should be, "If there is a shortage of food supplies, your infamous warfare sank the food supplies to the bottom of the sea."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The only question that would arise would be about Austria-Hungary, and the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has an amendment which he will offer to make that clear. I am as much opposed as the Senator from Arizona can be to anything going to Germany or her allies or cobelligerents.

Mr. KING, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I believe the Senator from Utah first addressed the Chair.

Mr. KING. I just want to suggest to the Senator from Arizona that he certainly did not mean that he would not support a proposition that involved expenditures in Turkey; that is, in Turkish territory. The Armenians are there, and hundreds of thousands of Greeks are there, many of whom are starving.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will let me answer, of course I may not have been very fortunate in my expression. I meant subjects of Turkey, our late antagonist. I think, instead of feeding the Turk, the Ottoman Turk should have been put to the sword for his long list of crimes about a thousand years in length.

Mr. WATSON and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think the Senator from Indiana first addressed the Chair.

Mr. WATSON. I simply wanted to suggest, in reply to what was said by the Senator from Arizona, that we have never been at war with Turkey, nor have we ever been at war with Bulgaria.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me answer that, if the Senator pleases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Just let me answer that one question. We may not technically have been at war with Turkey, but civilization has been at war with Turkey for about a thousand years.

Mr. KING. And we ought to have been.

Mr. ASHURST. And we ought to have been.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the line of demarcation seems to me to be very clear. It was expressed in the President's telegram, "The liberated peoples of Europe." That means northern France; it means Belgium; it means Serbia; and, although they were Turkish subjects, it also means Armenians, and Palestinians, and Syrians, and Poles, and Jugo-Slavs, if they need it, and Czecho-Slavs, if they need it. The language of the President was "the liberated peoples"—the peoples that we, with our allies, together liberated.

The Senator from Indiana is perfectly right in saying that even tecfnically we have never been at war with Turkey nor with Bulgaria; and, although technically, if we had been at war with either it might have included all of their subjects, yet it ought not morally to include those subjects who have been rebelling against Turkey and Bulgaria all the time—the Macedonians, for example, who have been trying to get rid of Bulgaria; the Jews in Palestine; the Arabs in Syria; the Greeks in Asia Minor and the Aegean Islands; the Armenians, who have been cruelly outraged in every way in the world in their mountains, over half of them killed, and the other half left starving. So that the language "the liberated peoples of Europe" seems to me to cover the whole situation. We can trust the men who are going to dispense this fund to see that it does not go to our enemies.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is absolutely no purpose to use any of this fund for the relief of our enemies.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question on the merits of the proposition?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. This is a gift, as I understand it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is not. It is to be used, as far as possible, as a revolving fund. They are to take obligations and securities from all of the governments where it is used where they can possibly be gotten. There may be some few very distressing cases where it may have to go as charity, but they are very few. In the main, it is to be used as a revolving fund, and it is expected that it will ultimately be repaid to the United States.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask whether or not either England or France is contributing a like sum, or any other sum, to the same purpose?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator that England and France have been contributing already, liberally, in advance of this arrangement.

Mr. WATSON. To this purpose?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. To this purpose. In one instance there was a shipment of $3,000,000 worth of flour to those starving countries. The governments of each of the four leading countries—England, France, Italy, and the United States—appointed two members of what they call a supreme council of supplies and distribution, I think—that is near enough, anyhow—to take charge of this matter. They took up the matter and determined that it was urgently necessary to have $300,000,000 for this purpose. We are called on to contribute $100,000,000, and that is to be the basis of the fund to which these other nations are to contribute. Italy is not able to do her full proportion, but France and England and Italy will all do something to make up the $300,000,000 and add $200,000,000 to the $100,000,000 contributed by the United States.

Mr. WATSON. And is it understood that Mr. Hoover is to be in charge of the distribution of all of this fund?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. Hoover and Mr. Davis are at the head of this supreme council.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They represent America on it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No; they are at the head of the whole business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know it; but the other countries have representatives, too.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Oh, the other countries each have representatives.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Virginia one other question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator has cited some instances where money has been voted by Congress to the people of other nations. Was any obligation accepted from those nations in those instances for the repayment of the money, and was any of it repaid, or was it a donation?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We could not well exact an obligation when we had not done anything. America has not contributed a dollar as yet.

Mr. MYERS. I say, in these previous instances, historical instances, years ago?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Oh, no. Those sums were donated for the relief of those people.

Mr. MYERS. Was any obligation accepted from the foreign nations?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. None whatever.

Mr. MYERS. The money was never repaid?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No. It was a donation to relieve starvation in those countries.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator has cited a number of instances of Congress giving away the people's money to the people of foreign countries, but he cites no section of the Constitution which gives authority for doing so.

I just want to say in this connection, if the Senator will permit me, in response to some questions that have been asked as to whom this money is to go to, that the cablegram from the President says that it is to go to the liberated peoples of Austria, Turkey, Poland, and western Russia, and I think in one of the other cablegrams that was exchanged Bulgaria was mentioned. Now, I do not know whom the President may mean by "the liberated peoples of Austria and Turkey." By "the liberated peoples of Turkey" he may mean the masses of the Turkish people. The Turkish Sultan has abdicated, as I understand, and the President may consider that the people of Turkey are thereby liberated. The Emperors of Austria and Germany have abdicated their thrones, and some people may consider that all the people of those two Empires are liberated from autocratic rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator may speculate as to what may be, but I tell him that we have the assurance of the President that none of this money is to go to the enemies of the United States or the allies.

Mr. MYERS. I do not see it anywhere.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Oh, there are a great many cablegrams. I did not bring here every one of them that has come from the President. There is a file of them that high. [Indicating.] I did not think it was necessary.

Mr. MYERS. I should think that in a matter of this kind, where hearings were had, the committee would set forth in the printed report of the hearings all of the light on the subject and all of the communications on the subject.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator will take the trouble to read the hearings he will find ample justification for the request.

Mr. MYERS. I have read the most of them, and I think it is not only a matter worthy of speculation but a matter worthy of the most specific and definite information, and I think the information contained in the hearings is very vague and unsatisfactory.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, it may be my fault; but I say very frankly that I do not feel like being ingenious in trying to find a way not to relieve the suffering and death of millions of people who are our allies in Europe. They are dying by the thousands and by the tens of thousands, almost by the millions.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me just a minute? I agree with him if they are our allies.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They are. I have assured the Senator of that. Not a dollar of this money will go to any people that have not been our allies.

Mr. MYERS. I can not find anything in the President's cablegrams to assure us of that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is plenty of it there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It says "the liberated peoples."

Mr. MYERS. But whom would he consider "the liberated peoples"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Those that we have liberated.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator consider the people of Turkey liberated because the Sultan has abdicated?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should speak of the Armenians and Syrians as being liberated from the rule of Turkey.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the President's cablegram specifically states that not a dollar of this money is to go to our enemies. It is to relieve the suffering and starvation of those who have been fighting this battle in Europe with us and with our allies. Nobody contemplates using one dollar of it for any other purpose than purely to relieve the suffering and death of those who have stood in the battle line with us.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the object is to feed the poor, starving people, not only of those countries that were in the battle line, but in other countries also, as I understood the request. In other words, this relief is supposed to quiet the people in the countries in which bolshevism is rampant.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Just wait until I get through.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask a question at this point.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Virginia yielded to me, and I am making this statement in his time. I think part of this relief is to be used in Austria.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Undoubtedly. The President says so in the cablegram I have in my hand.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, they were not fighting for us in the battle line.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No; but they were allied with us. They were with us.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to know what people in Austria were allied with us in this war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Bohemians contributed in large measure to the victory that has been won. The Czecho-Slovaks were technically Austrian subjects, but we went to all lengths to recognize them, and yet they were part of Austria, and so were the Poles part of Austria.

Mr. MYERS. They are not in Austria now. They have seceded from Austria.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are technically part of Austria until the peace conference remakes the map of Europe. They are the liberated peoples of Austria. The Czechs are, and so are the Poles. They are liberated from Germany, they are liberated from Austria, and they are liberated from Russia; and they have been known all through the correspondence and the discussion as "the liberated peoples."

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator what people who were our allies have been liberated from Turkey and Bulgaria?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Armenians are technically liberated, and so are some of the Greeks.

Mr. MYERS. Are they liberated? When were they liberated?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are liberated in the sense that they are under some protection whereby the Turks have been compelled to stop their persecution of the Armenians; and under the terms of the armistice and undoubtedly at the peace table protection will be given for the Armenians as well as for the Poles and the Czecho-Slovaks and the Jugo-Slavs. They are known as the liberated peoples of those countries, and they have to some extent already a government of their own. The Polish Government has been established; the Czecho-Slovak Government has been established; and each of those Governments will be able to give to the United States either its securities, or possibly even money, to reimburse in part this revolving fund.

It seems to me that it is very clear that the money provided in this bill is intended to be used for the relief of those people who are now struggling into national existence.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was only taking the time of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator how long we are to keep this feeding going in order to preserve peace in Europe? War may break out again. If so, are we expected to continue to feed these people?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are not expected to do it at all; but we are now in the act of concluding the war, and as a measure of concluding the war it is important to give an element of permanency to the new governments of the liberated peoples, and food is more important at the present time than bullets. Food will do more than anything else to bring about order and bring about hope and bring about confidence in these struggling peoples who are trying to get upon their feet. I believe it is the cheapest possible expenditure of the war measures; and I certainly think there can be no criticism of the President for having adopted not only a humane but a wise measure to promote peace.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, Mr. SHERLEY, the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, and myself united in a cablegram to the President for information about this matter, and I will read his reply:

I can not too earnestly or solemnly urge upon the Congress the appropriation for which Mr. Hoover has asked for the administration of food relief. Food relief is now the key to the whole European situation and to the solution of peace. Bolshevism is steadily advancing westward, has overwhelmed Poland, and is poisoning Germany. It can not be stopped by force, but it can be stopped by food, and all the leaders with whom I am in conference agree that concerted action in this matter is of immediate and vital importance. The money will not be spent for food for Germany itself, because Germany can buy its food, but it will be spent for financing the movement of food to our real friends in Poland and to the people of the liberated units of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and to our associates in the Balkans. I beg that you will present this matter with all possible urgency and force to the Congress. I do not see how we can find definite powers with whom to conclude peace unless this means of stemming the tide of anarchism be employed.

I have another cablegram, which was sent to the Secretary of State and sent to me by him:

Extended investigation and consideration of the food situation in certain parts of Europe disclose that especially the urban populations in certain areas are not only faced with absolute starvation during the coming winter, but that many of these populations are unable to find immediate resources with which to purchase their food. These regions have been so subjected to destruction by war, not only of their foodstuffs but of their financial resources and their power of production and export, that they are utterly incapable of finding any resources that can be converted into international exchange for food purchases. While the Secretary of the Treasury can accept obligations of certain Governments, and through these measures their situations can be cared for temporarily, there are still other areas through eastern and southern Europe where such arrangements can not be made. This applies more particularly to the liberated peoples of Austria, Turkey, Poland, and western Russia. In these countries freedom and government will slowly emerge from chaos, and require our every assistance.

The total shipments of foodstuffs from the United States to all parts of Europe during the next seven months will be likely to exceed one and one-half billion dollars, and from our abundance we can surely afford to offer succor to these countries destitute of resources or credit. The minimum sum upon which this work can be carried on for the next six months in the countries above mentioned will amount to at least $100,000,000 for such services and supplies as we can render, and even this sum contemplates the finding of resources by so much of the populations as can do so and so much assistance as can be given by the allied Governments. The high mission of the American people to find a remedy for starvation and absolute anarchy renders it necessary that we should undertake the most liberal assistance to these destitute regions.

The situation is one of extreme urgency, for foodstuffs must be placed in certain localities within the next 15 or 30 days if human life and order are to be preserved. I therefore request that you should ask Congress to make available to me an immediate appropriation of $100,000,000 for the broad purpose of providing foodstuffs and other urgent supplies, for the transportation, distribution, and administration thereof to such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by me from time to time as necessary. I wish to appeal to the great sense of charity and good will of the American people toward the suffering and to place this act upon a primarily humanitarian basis of the first magnitude. While the sum of money is in itself large, it is so small compared to the expenditures we have undertaken in the hope of bettering the world that it becomes a mere pittance compared to the results that will be obtained from it and the lasting effect that will remain in the United States through an act of such broad humanity and statesmanlike influence.

There are many other communications here from Mr. Hoover and from the President; but the sum and substance of it all is that a large part of the people of those countries in Europe which have been friendly and are still friendly to the United States are in a destitute condition. They are without food. They are starving. The men and women, and particularly the children, are dying from starvation; and we are asked to contribute $100,000,000, which is to be used as far as possible as a revolving fund, and most of it, it is believed, will be returned to the United States ultimately. Doubtless there will have to be an extended credit in some of the countries involved. The question is simply whether or not the people of the United States are willing to advance this $100,000,000, and, if need be, give a reasonable part of it. Some of it will have to go as charity; but most of it will be returned and will be used as a revolving fund.

The President has presented this matter very strongly, and I have numerous cablegrams here from him, from Mr. Hoover, and from the American mission. I suppose that means our peace representatives. The cablegrams are signed "American mission."

The fact is that anarchy is prevailing there. In many places there is nobody to treat with. There is a practical necessity to rehabilitate these European countries with whom we must soon make a treaty, so that something may be done to stem the wave of bolshevism and anarchy that is following the path of war in Europe. The question is simply whether the United States is willing to make this contribution, with the expectation that almost all of it will ultimately be returned to this country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Perhaps the Senator has explained this, and I did not hear it on account of the confusion. Do I understand that other nations in Europe are cooperating with the United States in this benefaction?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They are. England, France, Italy, and the United States have each appointed two commissioners to take charge of this matter. They are cooperating in providing this fund and distributing it to the suffering communities. They do not say exactly what the basis is, but the distinct arrangement is that they are to contribute along with the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The first cablegram by the State Department states that it will take $350,000,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Then they got it down to $300,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the last cablegram that came reduced that amount to $300,000,000. Upon that basis America is to contribute one-third and England and France and Italy are to divide the other two-thirds among themselves.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. BORAH. So far as these statements are concerned that it will take $300,000,000 or $350,000,000, it is just as much speculation on the part of those who sign the cablegram as it is upon our part who vote for this bill. This is just the beginning; that is all.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I think the Senator is entirely mistaken. Men who went into these various countries made an estimate as to the amount that would be required. It is not such a guess as we would make here, but it is an estimate carefully prepared by experts who have been sent into all of these countries to get us information; and I am sure this will be the end of it. There is no expectation that we shall be called upon for any further sum. I have not the slightest idea that we shall be.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator another question. He may have answered it before I came in. Is this money to be expended through a commission?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And that is the commission of which Mr. Hoover is the head?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. He and Mr. Davis, from this country, are the head of that joint commission from the four allied countries.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And they have absolute authority as to its distribution?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They will have absolute authority, under the direction of the President. The President is responsible for it. It is put under his authority. He delegates it to others, but he is responsible for it to the Congress. This bill provides that he shall account to Congress for it, and he ought to.

I will read another telegram:

The British are already furnishing from Army stocks food and clothing relief to Serbia and Syria; the Italians to south Austria; the British and French are advancing the money for transport Belgian relief. Allies are willing and anxious to do all they can, and have and will contribute to the full extent of their resources, but must be borne in mind that most of the food must be purchased in the United States, and American money would be used for such purchase and transportation.

Your 107 as to using this revolving fund. It would in effect be such a fund, but it must be borne in mind that it would ultimately be absorbed in giving credits possibly over long periods, to such peoples and institutions as our Treasury could not properly advance under the law, and some of it would be lost in sheer charity. This is not to replace Treasury advances to England, Belgium, France, Italy, Serbia, and Roumania Governments for the purchase of American food. The proposed appropriation would be entirely insufficient for these purposes. Might, however, later on be used to partially replace loans to Serbia and Roumania, but their urgent needs must in any event be cared for by the Treasury pending this appropriation. The matter is most urgent, and forms the foundation for any complete arrangement with the allies fixing their participation.

You see the exact per cent which these other countries are to furnish could not be gone into until it was known what we were going to appropriate. If we appropriate $100,000,000, it is a basis for determination as to what the others will contribute, but they are to make up $300,000,000.

There needs be great emphasis to all American officials and Congress that the armistice has left us large surplus of food, that if we are to dispose of it we are to give credits, and that as the Nation trying to put peace on high-level ideas on which we went into war, we can not be niggardly in the world's greatest problem to-day; that is, how to get food. I need not repeat that strong liberal relief is to-day the only hope of stemming the tide of bolshevism without the expenditure of lives and vast sums for military action. While it is urgently necessary to dispose of our surplus foods in order to relieve congestion and protect the producers from disaster and the consequent chaotic results, it is most fortunate for the saving of human lives that we have this surplus, and our country can not afford to fail to meet both emergencies.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I stated yesterday when the chairman of the committee made his report that there would be a minority report filed in the matter. I expected then that it would be filed, but the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has been confined to his home by sickness and the minority report has not been prepared. He and I had discussed the question of filing such report. I think having made that statement I perhaps owe a duty to the Senate to present the views at least partially that would have been presented in a minority report.

Mr. President, I know how unpopular it is to oppose any appeal for humanity. I think I am moved as much as anyone by appeals to aid suffering and distress, and there is suffering and distress in Europe. I have observed heretofore with what cheerful alacrity we are willing to vote charity out of other people's pockets. The fundamental objection to this whole matter is that we are compelling people in this country through taxation or bonds to give their money to a charity abroad. I say it is unpopular to oppose it. I know it is. I know it is unpopular in portions of my State, but I feel that the matter should be thoroughly discussed, so Congress may be fully advised in voting money for foreign charity.

We may as well be perfectly frank about these appropriation bills. Personally I shall be glad if we do not have to have an extra session, but I am not going to be a party to hurriedly passing appropriation bills through this body as we shall have to do in order to avoid an extra session. These appropriation bills will come over, I suppose, about the middle of February and that will necessitate that they must be immediately passed in order to avoid an extra session, but I serve notice now, as far as I am concerned, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, that the appropriation bills are going to have a very thorough investigation. I know no reason why the appropriation bills should originate in the House. There is no provision of the Constitution providing for that. We have been adjourning here from day to day and when we have been in session it has been chiefly listening to speeches. I do not know why we could not be working on the appropriation bills now. So much for that.

While there is hunger and dissatisfaction abroad and suffering, there is also suffering in this country. There are over 270,000 men out of employment in certain large centers in this country at this moment; and while I believe in aiding the suffering and distress abroad, I think we are rapidly approaching the time when we shall have to pay a little attention to our own country.

The reasons for this appropriation are indefinite. There are a number of telegrams—some from the President, I think one from Mr. Hoover, of the Food Administration, and one from the American mission. Coupling these with the testimony of Mr. Glasgow before the House committee and the Senate committee, it is difficult to get at the real reason for this appropriation. I shall, in my discussion, accept the President's reason for it. No study of the situation in Europe has come to us. They are all indefinite statements. Men who have visited different parts of Europe report to Mr. Hoover and Mr. Hoover in return must report to the President, and the President only knows of this as he gets it from Mr. Hoover.

This, perhaps, is a result of that secret diplomacy that is going on across the sea, which I believe the American people are strongly against and the sentiment of the Senate is strongly against. If I had my way about secret diplomacy I would wish that the President of the United States might serve notice upon those nations there that if they insist in their secret diplomacy against his point for open covenants he with his staff will return to this country and withdraw our Army from Europe and let Europe go ahead and take care of their business through their methods of secret diplomacy. I think that would end secret diplomacy. Strength to the President in his fight against secret diplomacy!

Under these telegrams we may well inquire, Is this money needed because of famine? Is it needed to assist in bringing about peace? Is it to assist in maintaining the prices of surplus products? I do not say that the latter is correct, but I do want to know. Mr. Hoover gets down in his telegram to the proposition that here is a great surplus of products. One telegram mentions pork products in the hands of the packers; further, that the people must be fed, and that we can maintain these steady standards of prices of pork products and at the same time feed those people, a consummation perhaps devoutly to be wished.

I only refer to that because I say this record calls upon us to expend $100,000,000, which when spent is gone. Do not let us think it is ever coming back. Let us not deceive ourselves about revolving funds. The bill merely provides that it may be a revolving fund. This amount is but a drop in the bucket if we are going to undertake to feed the people of Europe. How long are we to feed them? If we are going to keep on feeding them for months, well and good; let us face it and not deceive ourselves. When the next $100,000,000 comes along in 60 or 90 days let us not object to that if we are going to set this precedent now. If the world understands that this country is to feed all peoples, whether they work or not, we shall have a very busy time.

There is no arrangement shown by these dispatches with the allies, but there is some reference in the late telegrams which the Senator from Virginia has read of some $300,000,000 to be divided in some way. One of the other telegrams said: "It is believed that France and England and possibly Italy will unite in this work." They are just as much interested in this work as we are. Why should they not do their share. There ought to be before we appropriate this money, which the taxpayers of this country have to pay, some understanding, if it be appropriated, as to what we are going to do and what the other nations are going to do. Let us get out of the clouds and down to bedrock on this.

There was a statement in the Washington Times a few days ago, which appears in the committee hearings, which has not been denied, as to the real purpose of this appropriation, namely, that England has repudiated her contracts as to buying pork and has secured her meats from Argentina, and consequently there are great products of pork over there that can not be used, and, if lost, would very seriously interfere with the packers' profits as well as be a serious thing for those who need them.

There is no commission provided for the expenditure of this money. There is the organization of the Red Cross, with 5,000 agents in Europe, which has been diligent in feeding those people. They might be able to handle this fund. But, no, it is put in the hands, practically, of Mr. Hoover. I do not join for one instant in the onslaught upon Mr. Hoover. I think he has done a great work. The expenses of his bureau have been enormous—some $6,000,000 or $7,000,000. The expense of handling this fund in this way will be enormous. A commission would be far better than one man.

Gentlemen are already in Europe with retinues, stenographers, and complete office forces, arranging to take charge of these matters. It may be a good deal like the expenditure of missionary funds, where the cost is so great to get aid to the poor heathen. These are preliminary matters to my main objection.

The basis upon which I place my objection is that Congress has no right to take the money of the people by taxation and give it away in charity outside of this country. I do not feel at all certain that they can do so in this country, though an argument was made in the House in the Russian relief situation away back 18 years ago that while we could not do that for a situation in our own country, where the Constitution applied, we could do it as to a foreign country, because the Constitution did not apply there. That proposition was seriously urged by a very prominent lawyer in the House.

There has never been an appeal to the American people for any charity relating to this war to which they have not responded. If there had been an appeal to the American people for charity and they had not responded and people were starving over there, I think I should be willing to go beyond what I believe is our right under the doctrine that necessity knows no law, because it is pretty hard when there is a surplus of wheat or food in this world to think that people are starving. When we do that, however, and take property in taxes we are engaged in Bolshviki legislation.

But if this matter were made an appeal to the American people there would not be any question about raising this money, and raising it very quickly, by private donations. There is an appeal now for Armenia of $40,000,000. That will be raised in this country speedily. Under this bill money can be used out of this fund for Armenia, and people who have been patriotic and liberal in raising that money for Armenia will be taxed again just the same.

If the Government is to do these things, why have any funds like the one for the relief of Armenia? Why not levy taxes for the Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association and the Knights of Columbus and the Jewish institutions, and every other matter of that sort? Why submit these appeals to the people? In fact, if we start taxation for any of these purposes, why not taxation for all? If it is urgent in one case, it is in the others.

The Senator from Virginia has cited some precedents. It is true we appropriated money to Italy. There may be other instances. I want to call his attention to another precedent. The people of this country raised a large amount of corn and oats in the Middle West in 1892 to send across to Russia. Russia was starving. The Senate passed a joint resolution appropriating $100,000 for the Government to charter boats and take these grains to the starving people of Russia. That resolution went to the House. The matter is very interesting as to the position taken by the Democrats of the House, on the fundamental democratic doctrine as there enunciated—that we had no right to tax the people of this country and give away what was secured in taxes to charity.

I am merely referring to this as an historic incident and not in any partisan way. I am not much of a partisan. If Senators had time to follow that debate in the House, and what little there was of debate in the Senate, they would find it, I think, of great interest. In the Senate, Senator HARRISON of Tennessee said:

> I shall not object to the present consideration of the joint resolution. It is a charity that is bound to command the respect of all intelligent and charitable people, but believing as I do that I, as a Senator, have no right to tax the people to put money in the Treasury to appropriate to this or any other charity, I shall feel bound to vote against the joint resolution.

There were only nine Senators who voted against it, but when the matter came to the House it received more consideration. Several times there was an attempt to secure unanimous consent for its consideration. It never was secured. The appeal of President Harrison to Congress for the relief of the starving people of Russia was placed in the RECORD. It was just as intense an appeal as is now made by the President.

Mr. Bryan, who is known as a Democrat of standing, made a speech on that question calling attention to the fact that on this same Democratic doctrine, when an effort was made to furnish food to the drought-stricken people of Nebraska, Congress denied it. Mr. Blount, of Georgia, discussed the legal phases of the matter, and Mr. Kilgore, of Texas, remarked that as we seemed to be trying to take care of all the people of the world we had better begin taking care of the people at home. A pertinent suggestion now.

A motion was made to strike out the appropriation of $100,000. Mind you, the Government was not paying for the grain. That had been donated by the people of Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois, and Minnesota, and all that was asked was $100,000 of public money to charter ships to take those grains to the starving people in Russia. Senators now in this body who were Members of the House at that time voted to strike out that $100,000, and it went out, and not one cent was appropriated by Congress for that purpose.

So in my contention that we have no right to do this I am supported by very distinguished precedents of the House of Representatives and almost the unanimous Democratic vote of that body. These matters will all be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 23, Part I, pages 110 to 207.

Mr. President, there is another embarrassing thing about this beside the question of being against the appeals of humanity. I will go into my own pocket in proportion to what I have in this world just as deeply as any other Senator to give to any kind of a charity for humanity, and if my brother in the world is starving and women are hungry and little children are in distress they can have all I possess; but I am not willing to compel somebody else who may have a different view of his rights to give to charity if he does not want to do it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. May not the illustration or precedent to which the Senator invited our attention, where $100,000 was asked for the purpose of carrying foodstuffs to Russia, be distinguished from the case at bar? May not the present appropriation rest upon a sounder basis than that of mere charity, if you say that it is necessary and proper as a war measure? To illustrate, we have been at war with Austria-Hungary. Austria-Hungary is now disintegrated, and upon the ruins of that empire there are being erected two or perhaps four independent governments. Unquestionably the prolongation of difficulties there depends largely upon whether or not the people have sufficient for their maintenance. If they are starving there will be unrest, internecine strife, revolution, and warfare. There might be a recrudescence upon the part of the people of that land against the allied Governments, all of which would necessitate our Government retaining troops in Europe for a longer period of time. The same may be true in a measure of Poland. There will be erected, it is to be hoped, a republic, the Republic of Poland. If there shall be war in Poland, if there shall be controversy between Germany and Poland or between the Bolsheviki and Poland, unquestionably that will require American troops to remain longer in Europe.

I suggest for the consideration of the Senator, without expressing any opinion one way or the other, may we not rest this appropriation upon the foundation that it is a war measure, that it conduces to peace and to facilitate the withdrawal of American troops from the Continent of Europe?

Mr. KENYON. Of course, the Senator knows we have loaned to the Czecho-Slovak Government, I think, $7,000,000. We have made no such loan to the Jugo-Slavs, because that government has not yet been established. We have loaned to Serbia $15,000,000, I think. If we loan to these Governments carrying on this work that is a different proposition. What the Senator says is true with reference to the Jugo-Slavs and Poland. Roumania has a Government, and we have loaned to Roumania. We have loaned to those nations as if there were no limit to our pocketbook. I have found no fault with it. It seems to be essential. It is time now to be sure of what we are doing, and the taxpayers of the country have a right to insist that we do know. It is easy to be generous with other people's money.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the argument of the Senator tend to establish the proposition that those loans were beyond our power to make?

Mr. KENYON. I have thought a good deal about that. Those loans were made strictly during the time of war. The war is now over, according to the President's messages to Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. The armistice has been signed, but the war is technically still in existence.

Mr KENYON. Yes; the war is technically still existing; that is true. Those loans were for strictly purposes of the war. This donation can not be in any way for the purposes of the war. I might ask the Senator from Colorado if he believes these loans were legal?

Mr. THOMAS. I have had some question about it.

Mr. KENYON. So have I; but it has been one of those things during war times which we were not going to question.

I started to say that in addition to this there is another embarrassment in opposing this measure. It is not a pleasant pursuit. I know it is not going to get anywhere. I suppose there will be very few votes against it. But the charge has been made that it is embarrassing to the President. I have tried to stand behind the President during this war and have realized that he was President and would be for the next two years. I have indulged in a good many eulogies of the wisdom and farsightedness of the President. I do not want to be placed in a position, and will not be, of embarrassing him in any way; but I do retain the right to speak my views on a matter of this kind, and I am willing to be lectured for not following the President by anyone except those who have voted against woman suffrage, when he stood up here and insisted that he needed that to make the war a success. I draw the line of criticism at any gentleman who did that.

The President in one of his messages speaks of stopping bolshevism. "This is necessary to stop bolshevism." I do not know whether if you feed them they can fight better or whether that is going to stop it, but I like his plan of stopping it by feeding them better than the plan of a distinguished Republican, who would stop it by shooting them. You will stop bolshevism not by feeding them, you will stop it by removing injustices, and that is the way you will stop it in this country. Make no mistake about that.

I want to know further how the other funds which we have been voting here with such cheerful alacrity have been expended. That is a reasonable request. The Fuel Administration has been paying out expenses at the rate of something like $58,000 a month. The Food Administration has had enormous expenses. The Creel bureau sends us in some kind of a statement from which nobody can figure out what has been expended or to whom. I say we have a right, if we are not going to be told just how this money is to be spent, to inquire how other funds which we have voted here have been spent.

I want to call attention to one thing that was brought up in the House the other day showing how some of it has been spent.

A very interesting corporation was organized in the State of Connecticut, called the War Trade Board of the United States Russian Bureau, Incorporated. I have here the articles of incorporation and a certificate of its incorporation. This was organized to help to feed and to help to transport food in Russia. The chairman of the Democratic National Committee was president of this corporation. I do not refer to that in any partisan sense nor do I attach any importance to the fact that the nephew of the Secretary of State was secretary and treasurer of this corporation. It is a wonderful corporation. Here are some of the things it can do. The name of the corporation is the War Trade Board of the United States Russian Bureau, Incorporated. I will only say in this connection that $5,000,000 of the funds which we voted to the President were set aside as available to this corporation.

The corporation is to be located in the town of Hartford, Conn.

The nature of the business to be transacted and the purposes to be promoted or carried out by said corporation are as follows:

1. To engage in the business of buying, selling, importing, and exporting goods, wares, and merchandise of every description, and any and all kinds of personal property, and to carry on a general mercantile and commercial business in any part of the world.

2. To engage in any and all kinds of manufacturing, and to acquire, hold, lease, and sell all lands, buildings, machinery and equipment, and all raw materials and supplies necessary to or useful in the conduct of any such business in any part of the world.

3. To search for, prospect, explore, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, own, develop, work, operate, sell, lease, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of any and all agricultural, grazing, timber, or other lands, mineral deposits, mines, mining properties, collieries, and quarries, and the products and by-products thereof, all in any part of the world.

Some corporation, this, to relieve Russia.

4. To cultivate, cut, mine, crush, smelt, concentrate, refine, treat, prepare for market, buy, sell, exchange, export, import, trade and deal in any and all agricultural products, timber and timber products, oil, petroleum, coal, iron, metals, phosphates, nitrates, minerals, precious stones, and materials and products and by-products of all kinds, all in any part of the world.

5. To build, construct, complete, equip, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, hold, own, manage, operate, maintain, mortgage, sell, or otherwise dispose of hotels, apartment houses, boarding and lodging houses, restaurants, stores, shops, and places of public entertainment or amusement, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

The only thing they can not do is to operate barber shops, which is the greatest necessity among the Bolsheviki of Russia.

6. To build, construct, complete, equip, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, hold, own, manage, operate, maintain, mortgage, sell, or otherwise dispose of railways, telephone and telegraph systems, gas and electric light and power works, plants, and systems, and any other plants, machinery, or works for the production, manufacture, transmission, and distribution of light or energy of every nature and description, and to furnish and sell gas, electricity, steam, and any other kind of substance or energy used for lighting, heating, or power purposes, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

7. To build, construct, complete, equip, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, hold, own, maintain, operate, mortgage, sell, or otherwise dispose of, or turn to account, reservoirs, water powers, dams, flumes, watercourses, aqueducts, water rights, canals, irrigation systems, sewage, drainage and sanitary works, waterworks, and to furnish and sell water and water power, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

8. To promote, finance, build, construct, complete, equip, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, hold, own, operate, maintain, mortgage, sell, or otherwise dispose of wharves, piers, docks, bulkheads, dry docks, basins, tugs, floats, lighters, storehouses, warehouses, elevators, oil tanks, and other terminal facilities of all kinds, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

9. To build, equip, buy, own, lease, operate, and sell steamships, sailing vessels, and any and all other kinds of craft or instrumentalities used or to be used in the business of transporting freight or passengers upon water, and, in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut, to operate the same and engage in the transportation of or in the business of transporting freight or passengers.

What is the use of the Interstate Commerce Committee spending any time on the railroad question? This corporation can handle that except in Connecticut—

10. To take and receive upon deposit, as bailee, for safe-keeping and storage, jewelry, plate, money—

To help Russia—

specie, bullion, stocks, bonds, securities and valuable papers of any kind, and other valuable personal property, and to guarantee their safety, upon such terms and for such compensation as may be agreed upon by it and the respective bailors thereof, and to let out vaults, safes, and other receptacles, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

To help Russia.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. REED. If Connecticut is going to discriminate in this matter, I think we ought to serve notice on the Senators from that State to come to the Chamber.

Mr. KENYON. They probably know about this. This document continues:

11. To make loans or advances, either ordinary or privileged, either with or without security, at such rates of interest as may be agreed upon between the corporation and the borrower, either for ordinary banking or commercial purposes or for the special purpose of facilitating mining, agricultural, and industrial operations and public utilities, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

12. Outside of the State of Connecticut, to act as fiscal or transfer agent of any Government, municipality, or body politic, or corporation, and in such capacity to receive and disburse money, transfer, register, and countersign certificates of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In that connection I should like again to inquire how much of the money which has been appropriated by Congress has been turned over to this corporation?

Mr. KENYON. Five million dollars of the funds that we voted the President have been made available for this corporation. I do not mean to say that it has been spent, though some of it has been.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should not think that that would be nearly enough to do all of those things.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think it will be enough. I think, perhaps, they may be anticipating more.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Iowa know, as a matter of fact, that the money will not be spent? I am rather amazed to have the Senator criticize this effort which was planned for a peaceful penetration of Russia, having for its purpose the bringing to the Russian people the commodities they needed and were in dire distress for lack of, when the sole purpose of the corporation was simply to carry out a beneficent purpose of the Government to do those things.

Mr. KENYON. If that be true, I wonder why these articles of incorporation had to apply to any part of the world?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, the Senator knows very well that lawyers drawing up articles of incorporation are sure to make them comprehensive enough to contemplate everything.

Mr. KENYON. I am sure that they did so in this case.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What possible harm has come from that and what possible harm could come from it? It seems to me that the Senator is making a very unfair attack upon an administration which is confronted with the most stupendous difficulties. Some citizens of this country are objecting to a military penetration of Russia, and the Senator stands here now and criticizes the administration for having planned at one time, under the instruction of the President, a commercial penetration of Russia for the purpose of bringing relief to a country that was fairly weltering in distress and misery, many of whose social and political crimes were growing out of that misery, and that misery being availed of by the German enemy to organize the country against the United States and the allied nations. What possible good can come from taking up the time when this bill is before the Senate in criticizing that effort, which finally had to be abandoned?

Mr. KENYON. What relief did this corporation bring to Russia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Iowa is very well aware of the strong sentiment in this country that if only the United States could become the instrument of bringing relief to the people of Russia—bringing them shoes and food and clothes and the things that they were without—it would be possible to bring the Russian people to sanity, and that it would be possible to save the Russian people from German domination. Now, the Senator from Iowa stands here and criticizes the Government for making the effort. What does the Senator propose? What has he proposed? One Senator on the other side of the Chamber criticizes the administration for resorting to military force of the mildest sort, and the Senator now stands here and criticizes the administration for resorting to peaceful means in an endeavor to save Russia.

Mr. KENYON. There is no use of getting excited about it. The Senator from Nebraska is throwing more light on this Russian corporation than we have heretofore had. It is very interesting to know why they did not carry out their plans when the money was put at their disposal. Why did they not save Russia, as the Senator has suggested? Why did they not get shoes to Russia? Why did they not get food to Russia? They had plenty of money to do it, but evidently they did not accomplish very much.

Perhaps it may be called criticizing, but I was simply reading the articles of incorporation, if that was a criticism. I do think the articles themselves are a criticism of any board standing for them.

Mr. THOMAS rose.

Mr. KENYON. Just a moment. I am saying that we have the right to an accounting of the way this money goes, and I shall stand here and urge that whenever I feel like doing so.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa state the date of the articles of incorporation?

Mr. KENYON. The articles of incorporation are dated on the 6th day of November, 1918.

Mr. THOMAS. Just a few days before the armistice.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that is true. The names of the incorporators are in the document, three men who it was stated before the committee were clerks and dummies.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he knows whether or not in the formation of this corporation the laws of Connecticut were violated, as the laws of the State of New York were violated very clearly, as the evidence before the subcommittee of the Public Buildings and Grounds showed, by the United States Housing Corporation in the manner in which it was incorporated?

Mr. KENYON. I do not know about violating the laws of the State of Connecticut; but I do believe, as a lawyer, that public funds appropriated for the use of the President can not be turned over to a private corporation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I desire to say I think that these articles of incorporation were made under the laws of the State of Connecticut.

Mr. KENYON. They were.

Mr. THOMAS. And those laws provide those exceptions for general corporations which apply to the State of Connecticut.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Generally speaking, as to the corporations created under the laws of the State of New Jersey, under the statutes of the State it is provided that no railroads shall be built within the limits of the State under the provisions of incorporation; so there seems to be a compliance with the laws of the particular Commonwealth in both instances, the exceptions being due to the law and not to the intention or desire of the incorporators.

Mr. KENYON. The corporation was evidently incorporated under the laws of Connecticut, because of the broader power granted by the State of Connecticut, just as many corporations are incorporated in New Jersey.

Mr. THOMAS. What I am speaking about particularly is that corporations created under modern statutes in some of the States may comprise every pursuit on the face of the earth——

Mr. KENYON. I think that is true.

Mr. THOMAS. But for the protection of local corporations it is required that the exceptions be expressly stated.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is true; but the Senator does not understand, does he, that the statutes of Connecticut require that all of these things shall be put into the articles of incorporation?

Mr. THOMAS. They do not require that, no; but they permit it.

Mr. KENYON. They permit it, yes; but I see no reason for permitting it if nothing was to be done in this instance except as to Russia.

Mr. THOMAS. I see no reason for permitting it in any event.

Mr. KENYON. No.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me, the question was raised that this incorporation was brought into being for the purpose of keeping down discontent in Russia. The articles of incorporation were filed in the month of November. Of course, there has been no substantial change in the Russian situation since the month of November, for, while the armistice was signed after the date of these articles of incorporation, nevertheless that armistice had very little to do with the Russian situation. If it was necessary to get relief into Russia at the time these articles were filed, it would seem to me the same physical conditions now exist there. What I am anxious to know is whether this incorporation is going on to meet the conditions and to supply the necessities or whether the corporation has been substantially abandoned, if the Senator from Iowa knows?

Mr. KENYON. I do not know. I have heard the chairman of the committee state that the corporation would be dissolved. That is all I know about it.

Mr. REED. Was the reason stated, if I may inquire?

Mr. KENYON. No; I think not. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can say why.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a little history of the affair will clarify that very easily.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Nebraska shall interrupt me for a question or for reasonable remarks, but——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will not impose on the Senator's time.

Mr. KENYON. I am about to conclude.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The plan was initiated on the 5th of October, when the President issued an Executive order in which he said:

> By virtue of the authority vested in me by an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, approved July 1, 1918, appropriating the sum of $50,000,000 for the national security and defense, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, to be expended at the discretion of the President, I hereby set aside $5,000,000—

For this purpose. So that the act of the President took place when we were at war with Germany, and it was done under his power, given in the act of national defense for war purposes, that he sought to use this money for the commercial penetration of Russia, for the purpose of quieting Russia, and for the purpose of turning Russia into an ally in the war against Germany. It is very obvious that that purpose ceased when the armistice was signed a short time thereafter.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon a further interruption——

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Senator from Nebraska to mean—I am not asking this in any controversial manner at all; I want to get at the facts—that the real purpose here was to afford relief to suffering in Russia or was the real purpose to use this money so that the Russians would cease to be an ally of Germany?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I take it it was to use the money for the purpose of converting Russia into friendly territory as against Germany. Germany was making use of the distress of Russia, which bred the Bolsheviki idea, and the Bolsheviki idea was working for Germany's interests. The purpose was by this friendly penetration, by the sending of American products into Russia and the bringing of Russian products out of Russia in exchange for them, to promote trade and create a prosperity that could not come about from natural causes.

Mr. REED. And it was proposed to do that with $5,000,000?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The work was to start with a fund of $5,000,000, which was to be a revolving fund.

Mr. REED. I do not speak by the card, and I do not believe that anybody does, unless it may be the Senator from Nebraska. All the statements I have ever heard made about the purpose of this corporation were to the effect that there was great suffering in Russia and that it was intended to relieve that suffering. That is the reason I asked the question a few moments ago whether the same physical conditions did not exist to-day in Russia substantially that existed when these articles of incorporation were filed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But we have come to the end of the war, substantially.

Mr. REED. Yes; but people are starving there; and is it not proposed to use a part of the $100,000,000 now proposed to be appropriated in parts of Russia, I should like to ask?

Mr. KENYON. It is; yes.

Mr. REED. So that it will not do to say that the necessity for this corporation has ceased if it ever existed. I am not complaining about it, however.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The point I am making is that the President legitimately allocated this $5,000,000 out of the fund with which Congress provided him for the national defense. He felt that $5,000,000 used in Russia for the purpose of bringing relief and creating order and converting Russia to friendly territory would be well expended, better expended than if it were put into cannon and other purposes.

Mr. KENYON. I have not reflected at all upon the action of the President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator has——

Mr. KENYON. I am simply showing how our money goes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The money has not gone.

Mr. KENYON. It is available for this corporation, and some of it has gone.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator that it has not been expended, because the armistice put a stop to the work.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator say that none of it has been expended?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that $2,500 has been expended, and it is proposed now to dissolve the corporation.

Mr. KENYON. Why do they not go on in Russia and cure the troubles?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They do not propose doing it through this agency. They have expended $2,500, and that is all they expect to expend, and they propose now to dissolve the corporation.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think I have said in relation to this Russian bureau as much as I wish to say, except that I ask to put into the RECORD the certificate of organization, showing the officers and directors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the certificate will be inserted into the RECORD.

The certificate referred to is as follows:

FREDERICK L. PERRY, Secretary,
By ELMER H. LOUNSBURY.

Mr. KENYON. I do not intend if matters of this character are brought to my attention in the future concerning methods in which money which we vote is being expended to hesitate at all in calling the attention of the Senate and of the country to them. I regard this corporation as nothing less than a scandal.

Under one of the dispatches of the President the question arises, which the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] suggested, as to the use of this money to feed the liberated people of Austria, Turkey, Poland, and western Russia. I suppose the reference to the liberated people of Austria means the Czecho-Slovaks and the Jugo-Slavs.

A fund is now being raised in this country for Armenia. I have not very much enthusiasm for voting a tax upon the people of our country to keep alive at least that portion of Turkey which has massacred the Christians of Armenia and made the hills and plains of Armenia red with their blood. Of course, as to children and women, that is a different question. Nor am I so much concerned about Austria proper, except as to women and children. If there has to be any starving done in this world, I prefer to see Turkey and Germany and Austria and Bulgaria do the starving before the rest of the world has to starve. Would it not be well, Mr. President, to get around pretty soon to the question of taking care of our own country, or at least paying some attention to our own country. In our affection for the world let us not forget the people of the United States.

There are in this country at this time over 200,000 men out of employment; they will need help. And what of our soldiers? You can go to a hospital within the shadow almost of the Dome of this Capitol and find soldier boys who have been across the sea and who are back here now who have not had a cent of pay for seven or eight months. You can go to St. Elizabeths, a hospital for the insane, and find soldiers suffering from shell shock there in rooms with insane people because we have not money to provide, or at least have not provided, places for those soldiers. If you are going to do this humanitarian work throughout the world, I want us at least to begin at home on something that is not so much a humanitarian work as a work of justice, and not turn these soldiers out, as they are being turned out, with scarcely anything, and some of them without their pay. I want some of this money at least to go to the allotments of the mothers of this country who are being forgotten now the war is over. I have a letter from Sioux City, in my State, from the mother of a wounded boy brought back from France and now in the East who has not had any pay for seven or eight months, and she had to go around and peddle the vegetables she had accumulated in her cellar to get some money to send to him. In this great humanitarian cause of taking care of the whole world, let us pay some attention to getting things straightened out at home. Bolshevism abroad! Yes; if we can stop it let us stop it, and stop it by food if we must, but let us get at some of the causes in our own country that are creating discontent because of injustices.

Mr. President, I did not intend to take this much time, but I have been drawn from one thing to another. The main point I was making was that we do not have the right—though, of course, we can go ahead and act as is proposed regardless of law—to tax the people of this country for charity abroad; and, out of this confusion of telegrams, I accept the statement of the President that this is practically for the purposes of charity, at least a large portion of it. If it is for peace, then it must be that we are to take care of in some way or are to assist Germany with food. We want no peace by tribute. That is an unsettled question, and I do not know about it; the record before us does not show clearly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK rose.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator desire to interrupt me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to ask the Senator whether he has changed his views on that subject?

Mr. KENYON. What subject?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The expenditure of American money abroad.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose the Senator refers, or is about to refer, to a resolution introduced by me as to France?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I remember hearing the Senator say on the floor of the Senate that he was in favor of giving to France all the money we had loaned to her.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Which means hundreds of millions of dollars or thousands of millions of dollars.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I introduced a resolution to that effect.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And now the Senator objects to this expenditure that the President proposes.

Mr. KENYON. I introduced that resolution and spoke on it. If we should go back in the case of France to the time that France loaned us some money, part of which we never repaid, and figure the interest on that money down to this time, it would amount to an enormous sum, not so much, probably, as we have loaned to France, but at least to a considerable portion of it. That was in my mind, although I will say very frankly that, full of enthusiasm for France for what it had done for us in the past and what it had done in this war, I did favor cancelling that debt. That may seem inconsistent with my present position——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator's language was somewhat different from that. He did not qualify it as he does now.

Mr. KENYON. No; I think I did not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Or give any reason of that sort. Will the Senator permit me to quote what he said?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; it was a very good speech, I thought, at the time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator then said:

> It is a great thing, Mr. President, to have part in saving a nation like France. I do not mean by that to have any part in getting back any territory to France. I do not believe we are carrying on war for that purpose; but, as a part of saving civilization, we are saving those poor people of France, and they look up to us as a poor, weak sister to a great, strong brother coming to save her. When this war is over, I have said before, and I reiterate it, I hope this great, rich Nation will say to poor, bleeding France: "Keep all of the money we have loaned you. We ask not for the return of a single dollar."

That was the view of the Senator in January a year ago.

Mr. KENYON. That is the way I felt at that time, and I think I probably gave the same figures that I have given here as to the amount of money that France had loaned to us. I still feel that way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, will the Senator tell us the difference between the proposal which he thought advisable then and the one he denounces now?

Mr. KENYON. It is not the same. The obligations that we owe to France are different from the obligations we owe to any nation on the face of the earth. I do not think we would have had a nation had it not been for France. That money loaned was for war—ammunition and guns to shoot the foes of America.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator did not base his position a year ago on the ground of obligation; he based it on the ground of saving civilization, saving the poor nation of France?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the difference between saving those people and saving the starving people to whom the President refers?

Mr. BORAH. Turkey, for instance.

Mr. KENYON. I have given my reasons as best I can give them. I may appear inconsistent; but I feel entirely different about France than I do about the people of Turkey or the people of Austria, and I might, in any event, stretch my conscience more for the people of France than I would for the murderous Turks.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. In connection with the proposal to present to France a cancellation of her indebtedness to us, did the Senator propose, first, to offset it by the very large amounts of money, many millions, that we owe to France, to take that out, and give them the balance, or did he propose to remit their entire indebtedness to us and that we pay them some hundreds of millions of dollars we owe them in addition?

Mr. KENYON. I am really surprised, Mr. President, that my speech attracted so much attention.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator's speeches always do.

Mr. KENYON. I thought at the time it was made there were not over one or two Senators in the Chamber. But I will say about France what I have heretofore said and stand by that proposition. I wish we could do it; I do not know that we can; and, if we make any appropriations of this kind, of course we can not. I have said before that the situation was different. That will not convince unwilling minds.

Mr. WARREN. Still the Senator does not answer the question that I asked him, namely, whether he thinks we should remit to France all that she owes us and still have to pay France many millions of dollars that we owe to her?

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not. I think I figured at that time that, including interest from the date of the loan on the part that we had not returned, it would amount at that time to nearly as much as France owed to us then. Now, what we owe to France arising out of this war I do not know, but I have heard it stated that it would nearly balance the debt she owes us; but as to that I have no specific information.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I am through.

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I would have concluded earlier had it not been for the questions asked me. I now yield the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to offer two amendments in the same line. They are really one amendment in intent. I send them to the desk and ask to have them stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendments.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, in line 7, after the word "thereto," it is proposed to insert the words "including the Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, and other Christian and Jewish populations of Asia Minor, now subjects of Turkey."

Also, on page 1, line 7, after the word "Germany," it is proposed to insert "German Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the purpose of that amendment is simply to define a little more closely the populations to whom this relief is to be extended.

I do not myself believe in extending aid to those countries which brought all of this misery on the world. I think we ought to save and help the people whom they have brought to this condition. As the bill stands, there is nothing to prevent this money being spent for the maintenance of the Turks. In that, I confess, even at the risk of seeming hard-hearted, I feel but slight interest. But I do want to see the Armenians, the Syrians, and the Greeks, who have all suffered from the Turkish rule, and suffered horribly, aided, and the Jewish and Christian populations of Palestine. I have worded the amendments so as to cover those two points, and also German Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria, who stand in precisely the same position toward us that Germany does.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I shall be glad to see the amendments adopted. I think they improve the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendments offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only want to say in conclusion that, of course, my object in seeking to have this amendment added to the bill is to improve, as I think, a measure for which I shall vote and which I think is absolutely necessary as a part of the work of carrying out the conclusion of this war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is a thankless, and doubtless many will think a thoughtless, task to oppose the passage of this bill, but there are reasons why the bill in its present form and with the information which we have before us can not receive my support. I do not care to have the RECORD stand without some remarks of explanation.

There may be facts in existence which justify the passage of this bill, but this Congress has not got them. There may be the machinery and the plans by which this money can be carried effectively to Europe, so as to bring about a better condition of affairs in Europe and to stabilize Europe, but this Congress has not got them. There may be a sufficient and conclusive reason as to why this money should be appropriated, as a part, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says, of the program of finishing up this war, but the Congress has not any such facts before it.

No one is responsible for the expenditure of this money and for the burden which will be placed upon the people of this country in gathering this money in the way of taxes save and except the Congress of the United States, which is wholly without the facts. We can not hold Mr. Hoover responsible, and neither can the people of this country hold Mr. Hoover responsible in any way for the expenditure of this money under the terms of this bill. It is a wide, latitudinous power given to him to expend $100,000,000 in what is said to be the regenerating of an entire Continent. We are entirely without information as to how it is to be made effective. We are wholly without facts as to where it is to go, except in a most general way—so general that it furnishes no information at all to you and to me; and yet we are the only people in this entire movement who are responsible to the taxpayers of this country.

I venture to say, Mr. President, that if a man stood at the head of a vast business institution that was authorized to take trust money and had trust funds in its possession and should be asked to transfer them to the use of a cause, however humanitarian and just it might be, with no more protection and no other safeguards than are authorized by this bill, when he was called upon to report upon these trust funds his defense would not be heard in a court of justice. The thing of which I complain, sir, is placing me, as a humble Member of this body, in a position where I must answer, as a Member of this body, to the taxpayers of the country, without giving me any information by which and by means whereof I can report to them at any time in my public career.

This fund is not ours, and there can be no more serious duty devolving upon the Congress of the United States right now than that of adding a further burden to the already harried and overburdened people of this country. The time has passed, Mr. President, when it is no longer a serious matter to appropriate large sums of money in this country. It may be that we are compelled, by reason of the circumstances which surround us and the environments which envelop us, to appropriate these sums of money, but we can only do it, sir, after the most thorough and complete investigation and after the fullest and most complete facts are before us so as to justify us not only in the law but in the court of conscience for having done so.

What reason could we assign if this money should be expended in a profitless way, in a fruitless way, or in territory of which we did not approve? What would be our remedy, and what response would we give to those whose money we had expended?

There is another reason which makes it impossible for me to support this bill. It is an unpleasant one to mention; nevertheless, it is here.

I recognize in Mr. Hoover a man of great ability. It is not my purpose, by anything which I shall say, to challenge his personal integrity; but his viewpoint of things is such that it makes it impossible for me to turn over a hundred million dollars to him to expend in Europe. For the last four weeks I have been making a pretty thorough study of the relationship of the Food Administration to the vast concerns of this country which control and dominate the food supply of this country; and I say here upon the floor, and I challenge successful contradiction, that three of the vast monopolies which control food in this country have, with relation to their commodities, directed and controlled the Food Administration since its organization. I do not mean by that to say, sir, that Mr. Hoover himself has received any personal or individual benefit by reason of that. I simply mean to say that his viewpoint is such that he permits those people to, in effect, fix their own prices and to arrange their own affairs to such an extent that it is a case of an individual dealing with himself in the transactions. I have been utterly amazed at the facts which show how these combines have influenced and controlled the situation.

It is well known, sir, that the meat packers of this country have been one of the great, powerful units in this matter of furnishing food. Now, sir, at a time when the people of this country are hungry, when our own people are suffering, when, according to the Associated Press dispatches a few days ago, hundreds of thousands of children in New York and Chicago and other great cities are not only kept out of school for want of clothes but are actually dying for want of food, when mothers are committing suicide because they can not respond to the lips that are begging for food, it is a fact, demonstrated over the signature of the meat packers themselves, that their profits under Mr. Hoover amounted to all the way from 20 to 40 per cent for the last two years. Shall I be called upon, under my oath as a Senator here, to turn over a hundred million dollars to feed the poor of Europe, when I am notified that out of that $100,000,000 those that control the food products of this country will ask, and probably receive, from 25 to 40 per cent profit on their investments?

They say "This is to be turned over to the President." Now, let us be honest and eliminate the President. We know that it is absolutely impossible for the President to know anything about the details of this expenditure. With the stupendous burdens resting upon his shoulders which are now there, with the difficulties which confront him, with the fearful task which is his, do we suppose for a moment that he will be familiar with a single detail in regard to this matter?

It is unfair to the situation and unjust to us to say that the President is responsible. He is not responsible. He will know nothing about it from the beginning to the end. We are responsible. We are the only ones who have the fearful power of drawing this money out of the pockets of the people. If I had the time, sir, I would undertake to show you that the facts are here which make you and me accomplices to the transaction which, if we vote this appropriation, will enable these vast concerns to get a very large portion of the taxes which we are voting.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment.

Now, Mr. President, I want my position to be understood. It may be necessary for us to feed the people of Europe. If the humanitarian call comes to us from Macedonia we can not refuse to listen; but, as a Senator, I am under obligations to know that those upon whom that task devolves are men who have such a viewpoint that they will not only save the starving people of Europe but that they will protect the taxpayers of the United States, because while we are a strong Government and a well-poised people do not forget that bolshevism is not confined to any nation.

I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho, in connection with the references he has just made to profits on capital and profits on food, to the fact that there is a vast difference between profits on capitalization and profits on the turnover of business. I do not think anybody contemplates or believes that 47 per cent, or 25 per cent, or 10 per cent profit has been made on the food to which the Senator has been referring. It may have been made on the capital of the corporations conducting that industry.
